United States Coast Guard Wants Men

A new program permitting the immediate enlistment of all qualified applicants has been announced by the United States Coast Guard Recruiting Office, Omaha. The men will be sent home after being sworn in, and will remain on inactive duty until called for assignment to a training station. This plan amounts to an unlimited quota of enlistments, since all the men who qualify will be accepted.

The recruiting office suggests that men living some distance from Omaha write for application blanks. The applicants will be called in for enlistment as soon as their character references are checked, then returned to their homes to await their call for active duty. The office urges that all applicants keep their jobs, as the waiting period after enlistment may be as long as several weeks, during which no salary is paid by the Coast Guard.

Neither is any transportation furnished to the recruiting station or back home. This expense must be borne by the applicant. The Coast Guard starts providing transportation when a new recruit leaves the recruiting station for active duty.

However, after being sworn in, a man will be a full-fledged member of the Coast Guard Reserve, and is no longer subject to call by selective service. The recruiting station notifies the local selective service board of a new recruit the day he is sworn in. Being registered for the draft is no bar to enlistment in the Coast Guard, the recruiting office pointed out.

Men between the ages of 17 and 55 are eligible for enlistment in the Coast Guard. The same salary and allotments for dependents are paid as in the other three military services.
