BEFORE THE BIG "FISH" GETS AWAY

BOYS who used to ride the "North Western" home from vacation, complaining about the "big one that got away," are now on PT boats, in submarines, or flying torpedo planes, getting another kind of big "fish" away where it counts most.

But before those torpedoes are launched the shell must be manufactured at one place, the explosive at another, and the assembly completed at a third, and then transported to ocean cargo vessels. All of these operations require extensive rail service. By the same token, foods must be transported from farm to processor, from processor to consumer. And fighting men must be moved from home to camp, from camp to camp, and to ports of embarkation. This transportation is the job the railroads are performing.

Men, munitions, supplies—all are being moved in quantities unheard of before. It's the biggest transportation problem in history—a problem which is being handled swiftly, efficiently, by American railroads.

"North Western's" 32,000 skilled railroaders are proud to share the solving of this problem, and their continued effort will be limited only by the supply of materials obtained to maintain track and equipment adequately.
