Every farm, city and town business should keep books. Swift & Company would have to whether it wanted to or not. It must make accurate reports to its 60,000 shareholders, must know whether it is making or losing money. And then, at the end of the year the company must make accurate statements of the year's results to the United States Government for income tax returns as well as for other purposes.

Persons not connected with the management of Swift & Company go over its books and check the accuracy of the figures from which Swift & Company's financial reports and income tax returns are prepared. These outside persons are Certified Public Accountants. They are licensed by the state, which certifies them as accounting and auditing experts.

It is in this way that the accuracy of figures published by Swift & Company is verified to all those interested in knowing the facts about the meat packing business as conducted by this company.

SWIFT & COMPANY

THE OLD JUDGE SAYS...

"Sorry Judge, my shipment of suspenders still hasn't come in. Some articles are mighty scarce these days. I don't get anywhere near as much as I could sell."

"With the war going on, Frank, we've got to expect those things. It's true of luxuries just as it is of necessities. Take whiskey, for example. There's a real shortage in that. It's to be expected when you realize there hasn't been a drop of it distilled in this country since way back in October, 1942.

"The only thing distillers have been making during that time is war-alcohol for the Government. So, I wasn't surprised a bit to read how bootlegging and black markets have sprung up around the country as a result of the dwindling supply. Our 13 years of prohibition proved that if folks can't get legal whiskey, they'll get illicit whiskey. Sure hope the shortage doesn't last too long. I'd hate to see this country turned over to the bootleggers again."

DO THEY REALLY?

Are You A Slacker?

One day a rich man walking through a large city met a haggard, poorly dressed youth, who begged for some money to buy food. On being asked how he had become so poor, the boy said that his parents had died when he was about ten, and since none of his relatives had been willing to take him, he was sent to an orphanage. Six months ago the orphanage found him a job and sent him out to make his own way in the world. At first he did well, but times were hard and his employers were forced to close down a few weeks before. Since then he had tramped the streets looking for work, and now he was penniless and was forced to beg his food.

The story was not unusual, but something appealing about the youth touched the rich man's heart. His own children were grown up and had left him to lead their own lives; his wife was dead and he lived alone in a big house full of servants. So he took the boy home and fed, clothed and sheltered him, and in time grew to love the boy as his own and adopted him. This young man became his son and from this relationship acquired new rights and duties. He obtained the right to call the rich man "father," the right to be supported by him; he obtained the right to call the rich man's other children "brother" and "sister"; he obtained the personal rights which belong to a man's natural son. But he also received certain duties; he was bound to respect and obey the rich man; he must love and help his new brothers and sisters; he had to develop his talents and make something of himself.

Now each one of us is in exactly the same position. In a very real sense we are made the sons of God and brothers of our fellow men by creation. From that relation we obtain certain rights and duties which are contained in the moral law. Now this moral law confers certain rights on man. Man gets the right to call God "Father," to call Him for assistance. It gives him the right to call all men "brother." From it he receives personal rights—to exist, to earn his own and his family's living, to marry and to attain his end in peace and security. But it also lays upon him certain responsibilities—to adore and obey God; to respect the rights of his brothers as regards life, sustenance and property; he must care for his own body and soul since both were given to him by God.
