Youth of Today Grow Up Fast

BY A. STROLLER

A recent mail brought the writer an interesting and suggestive circular letter. Instead of throwing it into the wastebasket, the fate of a great many circular letters, he opened and read it carefully. He felt well repaid for the effort.

This letter had been sent out by the Nebraska State Teachers college at Wayne and stated that the school "is experiencing an outstanding Summer session with its highest enrollment in the post-war period." It also stated that 28 per cent more students are registered in 1949 than there were in 1948. Then, followed more information in regard to the present Summer session.

All this was interesting enough, but the thing which challenged the writer's attention especially was a long list of names which followed of young people who are or have been attending the Summer school.

These names were arranged according to the towns in which the students lived and the list sent the writer naturally included the students who lived in the various towns of his own county. Four towns were listed, two of which, including the county seat, were represented by a large number of students and two by one each.

To the average person, these names would probably be only statistical, but they were more than mere statistics to the writer. As he glanced over the list, most of the names looked strangely familiar—names which he had been acquainted with in bygone years, as, indeed, in point of fact, he had.

He didn't recall many of the first names of the young men and women who were attending this Summer session, but he did remember most of the last names.

The reason was apparent—they were the names of families whom he had known for years and the students were their children, or, possibly, their grandchildren. All of the young people had grown up within his memory and some of them had even been born during the period.

The thought suggested by the incident was that time passes rapidly and the children of yesterday are the adults of today.

They grow up fast.
