"I felt—and I know—I was followed. Everywhere I went in Prague people would stand and stare. There really haven't been any Western visitors to Czechoslovakia through the Summer. First question they asked me at the American embassy was: 'How did you get in?'

"All visas have been refused to all-comers in the embassy all Summer, and I can well understand.

"The Czech people are very unhappy and rightly so."

Miss Fisher declared that the Czechs were being dealt with more harshly and more severely than under the Nazi occupation during the late war. They are under continuous surveillance themselves; prices are absolutely unbelievable. The price of a man's pair of shoes was the equivalent of $80; a man's suit, $160. This doesn't mean much unless you understand that the average Czech worker earns only about $100 per month. The worker can't change his job, has nothing to say about his future. If he owns his own business he has no idea how long he'll have it.

"Stories," Miss Fisher explained, "are rampant about the Communists appropriating private homes and driving out the natives."

"The whole country is in a very depressing state."

When the Pan-American airliner landed at Prague airport, Miss Fisher and an American courier (from Germany) were the only ones to deplane. The charming young Miss Fisher, however, was subjected to considerably more luggage inspection, red tape, etc.

About Paris, Miss Fisher said the French capital was as gay and beautiful as she had always dreamed it would be.

"I do believe it is one of the more beautiful cities of the world—perhaps the most beautiful with its wide boulevards and its wonderful buildings."

"I went from Paris to Switzerland, then to Venice and Florence, Italy. At Rome I was privileged to have an audience with the Holy Father.

"From Rome I went to Athens, Greece, and found that country very much under military law."

"Hotel accommodations and food in Greece are really not adequate for American tourists."

Miss Fisher was impressed with the charm and daytime gaiety of Madrid, Spain, but was disappointed in having to wait until 10 o'clock in the evening for dinner. The city is virtually locked-up during the popular afternoon siestas. The people drink coffee at sidewalk cafes for hours at a time. At about 7 o'clock in the evening the promenades are begun. People roam round-and-round the streets. Half of them sit, drink coffee and watch, then they change-around. Promenading goes on night-after-night. Eventually they get around to having dinner.

"I flew to Cairo, Egypt, from Athens. I was totally unprepared for Cairo. It has the European culture but plus that it has the Oriental influence. Very colorful is the sight of the natives running around in their long, flowing nightgowns (there's no other word for them). The smell, dirt and filth of Cairo I will never forget."

"I believe Cairo is the dirtiest city in the world—I know it's the dirtiest city that I have ever been in. But, strangely, it is also one of the most glamorous and beautiful—with the Nile river, the pyramids in the distance."

"Of course, I had to ride a camel to see a sphinx. We visited with a number of natives and we were very privileged to get into some of the Moslem homes. The better homes are very luxurious and are very well staffed with servants. Every American has at least three servants. It's just ordinary to have that many servants if you're an American."

From Cairo, Miss Fisher turned her sights toward home. She flew in the daytime over the vast wasteland of Tripolitania and saw some of the ruins of the desert warfare. She went from Cairo to Tunis and Algiers and from Algiers to Madrid.

Heading out to sea on the first leg of the transatlantic journey, she took off from Lisbon, Portugal.

From Lisbon she flew to the Azores and from the Azores leaped to Boston, Mass. The air routes were established during World War II.

Miss Fisher spent part of the weekend in O'Neill and reached Denver Sunday.

She says she lost all count of her mileage but someday she will haul out the maps and approximate the distance she traveled.

Being in the travel profession, Miss Fisher is confident her tour will be of extreme practical value in routing tourists.
