In a reminiscent mood, Mrs. Walmer went back to childhood days when in 1879, a youngster -years-old, she came to Nebraska and to the vicinity of what is now Ewing with her parents, the late Mr. and Mrs George Jones, who later became so well-known in Ewing, O'Neill and Holt county as well as in Orchard and other Antelope county towns.

The first home was a comfortable sod house, 12 miles north of Ewing and 17 miles from O'Neill. The house was large enough, recalls Mrs. Walmer, to shelter a goodly number is occasion demanded. One night 27 persons slept there, among them other pioneers looking for a location.

Walmer replied that at first there was no public school, but since her mother had been a school teacher, she obtained text books and taught her own children, later, a sod house provided a place for a public school, Desks were provided by planks secured around the walls and with other planks for seats. The pupils sat with their faces to the wall and, when they wished to leave their seats, they had to swing their feet over the top of the plank in order to get out. Slates took the place of blackner guests in the Al Deirking boards. This first school was called the Lambert school. "The first sermon preached in that neighborhood was in the Jones sod house by Rev. Bartley Blain, later to become county superintendent of Holt county,' ecalls Mrs. Walmer. "And," she continued, "the first dance in that neighborhood was in my father's house, too. And when ne built his new barn, the first earn dance was held there, with . W. Brion, of Ewing, doing the iddling.'

Oldtimers remember what good fiddler he was and how folks enjoyed dancing to his merry tunes.
