MICRO WAVE RELAY CROSSES NEBRASKA

Have you seen those huge towers being erected across the state?—towers carrying a big horn-like contraption?

These are the new micro wave relay towers. They will carry television signals, linking the East Coast with the West Coast. With Nebraska directly on the television network main line, we may expect additional television broadcasting stations in the state, eventually.

More and more, television is proving its importance as an educational medium. Recent national events have established this conclusively.

In another field, education has proved its importance—maintaining Nebraska's good tavern conditions. For years, the brewing industry has devoted time and expense to show retailers and importance of keeping their places neat and attractive—of carefully observing all legal requirements. As a result, Nebraska's general tavern operation merits high praise.
