Wisconsin Emigrant Sends Back Stories

Life Along Oregon Trail Told

One of the thousands of emigrants going across Nebraska in the spring of 1853—just a century ago—was S. H. Taylor, who, with his family, emigrated from Watertown, Wis., to Oregon. Like many another emigrant he took time out along the way to write letters back to his hometown paper—in his instance the Watertown Chronicle. His letters were later republished in the Quarterly of The Oregon Historical society and they provide an interesting glimpse of life along the trail in Nebraska a century ago.

The Taylors left Watertown in the middle of March. May found the family at Council Bluffs, ready to take off on the long journey from the Missouri river to Oregon. In a letter written from Council Bluffs on May 24, Taylor said: "Horse trains went out on grain as early as April 18, but companies of cattle did not get out trusting to grass until about 10 days ago. It is considered barely safe now to go out with horses depending on grass solely."

On June 4 Mr. Taylor wrote: "We are now 90 miles up the Platte on the Loup Fork, in company with about 250 wagons, blocked up here, near what was called a ferry before it was flooded, waiting for the water to subside.

"We are in the heart of the territory of the Pawnees, the most skillful thieves that can be; and some are paying dearly for the water. In this neighborhood they have stolen about 50 head of oxen, and every morning we hear of from two to six oxen being run off. About 200 Pawnees came here three days ago and are lying here with us, but what intention we know not. We are not afraid of our lives but we find them very annoying. They will almost steal a horse from under his rider."

Nebraska roads, then as now, were the subject of much complaint. The spring of 1853 was a very wet one—"the wettest known."

Mr. Taylor warned that those who had been through in dry seasons could have no idea of the difficulties involved in trying to journey across Nebraska during wet weather.

"Even the road along the Platte, except a few miles along the base of the highlands, is horrible. Last Wednesday we saw many wagons set on the Platte bottoms and I am sorry to say mine was one of them."

In dry weather, though, the Platte valley roads, Mr. Taylor opined, would be superb. In many sections he thought they would be superior even to a plank road.

"There are places where 30 thousand wagons have, within five years, passed along a track of not over seven feet in breadth, and there is no rut—no depression of one inch below its original level."

Like most of his fellow emigrants, Mr. Taylor took special note of Chimney Rock, surely one of the most outstanding landmarks along the trail. Many are the descriptions of Chimney Rock to be found in the literature of the overland migration of the American people.

Mr. Taylor's follows: "Chimney Bluff is a tunnel shaped mass of clay, perhaps 170 feet high, of really fine shape, and its center being a shaft probably 60 feet high and seemingly not more than five feet in diameter. They are both entirely naked of vegetation and the rains are slowly washing them down."
