

Big 'Copter Soon to Reach Test Site

Force - Cambridge field project directorate here are Dr. Guenter Loeser, who has been on the scene two weeks, and Dr. Heinz Lettau. Both are German scientists now employed by the U.S. air force.
Open-house will be observed at the site on designated days, probably Sundays, Mr. Davidson said.
"Scientific research fashion has changed in late years," Mr. Davidson commented. "Modern scientific problems are approached and studied now in parcels or phases. The O'Neill test is a cooperative matter with the air force working in cooperation with two navy research establishments and 10 colleges and universities. Two of the participating organizations, for example, will be doing research primarily for the navy."
"Iowa State college has agricultural problems in mind - real practical problems of interest to farmers."
"Ainsworth also was considered for a test site. The nature of the test means it's a mid-continent proposition and weather bureau records, terrain and facilities within the city were factors in bringing us to O'Neill."
"O'Neill is admirably suited for the test in many ways. When the wind blows here it blows steadily from one direction for several days. The Kansas City weather bureau will advise us when to go on an alert for our work and we'll usually have 24 hours advance notice. Several of these alerts will be 'scrubbed,' no doubt, before we even get started, because of a change in conditions. We are prepared for that. We need six ideal nights for a period of six weeks to assure success," he concluded.
