Figures Under Attack

LINCOLN—The state board of equalization this week began working through all the data given it by most of the 93 counties at assessment hearings, seeking the answers to this year's equalization effort. Its decisions to raise valuations in many counties and possibly lower them in a few cases will have a far-reaching effect. It will mark the first time a state board has taken so much action since the depression years when assessments in some counties were cut. The nearest to it was last year's action which raised valuations of farmlands in 19 western Nebraska counties.

"We must get the assessments of all the counties as even as a tabletop. These six days of hearings have proved that beyond a doubt."

Parade—It was a fascinating parade of counties, beginning with Sioux county in the far northwest and ending with Richardson in the southeastern corn belt. The varieties of the Nebraska economy, its folk, and its county officials were all amply presented in the six days of hearings.

Neighbors—The counties came in by districts which had the value of allowing officials to hear what their neighbors were contending. The counties left all their Chamber of Commerce propaganda behind and mostly spent their time moaning about a decline in prices, insisting that the past five years were special boom times in their counties and should not be used for comparison purposes, and in general tried to prove their counties were "unique."
