Missionary Under 4 Types of Rule

A recent visitor to O'Neill was a man who had spent 44 years as a missionary to China. He went to China for the first time in 1910. He has lived under the rule of four different types of government, including Chinese nationalists, Japanese, the communists and the war lords. Of these, he said, the communist rule was the worst, the one having the most successful propaganda and the most polite in the early rule.

The returned missionary, Rev. Wesley Smith of Seneca, Mo., spoke several times in the O'Neill community—three times at the Methodist church and twice at the O'Neill public schools. The main feature of three of these discussions was the telling of living under communist rule for over two years. His wife was with him abroad.

The community in which they lived was introduced to the coming of the communists by "a visit of two communist soldiers who very politely came to their door one day and told them not to be afraid that they had been delivered from danger."

The economy of the people was then put under very close, police supervision. No one could keep any more grain, clothes, food, then was allotted to them by the party. To have more of these commodities might create a "capitalistic economy" in which the people would sell their surplus and thereby gain more than their neighbors had. In the matter of clothes, this led during this period to bringing in all the extra clothes to a common place where clothes were divided up. Even the soldiers under training in that community were issued only one outfit. Eventually, while drilling in a cold rain, the entire group took sick. They had no chance to change into clean, dry clothes, no heated room in which to dry their clothes. Therefore, the sickness. After that, extra clothing was issued to the soldiers.

Another feature of the rule of the communist group was that no one could leave the community without permission, not one person could be gone overnight, even for a visit, without permission. Naturally travel was reduced tremendously.

When asked by a number of persons how we can best combat communism, Mr. Smith would reply: "Make democracy work!" He said that though this was a brief answer in terms of words, that the working out of the answer would take the combined efforts of all democratic peoples. But he did believe that applying such a positive approach would be successful in time.
