Peach Tree Thrives on Johnson Farm

W. H. Johnson, 70, a semi-invalid who resides five miles northwest of Ewing, Saturday picked a bushel of peaches off a thriving peach tree in his front yard.

It's a race between the unripened fruit and Jack Frost for a second bushel.

Mr. Johnson buried an ordinary peach seed in the ground in the shadow of the family dwelling nine years ago—about the time he became paralyzed on his left side. He nursed the tree through the early years, but now is proud of his product. In the spring the blossoms attract attention of passersby and a neighbor, Mrs. Harry Van Horn, drove a mile the first year of the blossoming to inquire about the riot of color. The tree, on the south side of the house, affords some shade, too.

Mr. Johnson has misgivings about how the tree will do in the future. He said a late snow and sleet storm this spring cramped the leaves.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnson moved onto the place in 1915. They have six daughters and two sons. One son, Delmer, farms with his parents.

Home from College—Edward ("Eddie") Tomlinson, a junior at the agriculture college of the University of Nebraska, came home Saturday. He left early Monday morning for Omaha where he judged horses.

His brother, George, is enrolled as a freshman at the university.

Mr. and Mrs. M. E. Asher and son, Lyle, were overnight guests last Thursday at the H. E. Asher home. They were enroute to Kingsted, Ia., to spend the weekend at the C. H. Chambers home.
