

Nixon's Visit '56 Starter

LINCOLN—The first stirrings of political activity in the 1956 election campaign could be seen this week with Vice-President Richard Nixon scheduled to meet with republican party leaders in Omaha.

Although the vice-president was invited to Nebraska to speak to a convention of volunteer fire-fighters the republican leaders used the occasion for a confab in Omaha, assessing the party's strengths and weaknesses in next year's election.

At this point with the May, 1956 primary many months away, the campaign looks to be fairly calm. Particular if President Eisenhower runs for re-election not too much excitement should occur even in the general election.

There seems to be no reason to believe the Nebraska republican party will be shaken from its 14 year dominance of the congressional delegation and Statehouse at Lincoln.

There will be no race for the U.S. senate and Sen. Carl Curtis has until 1959 and Sen. Roman Hruska until 1957.

The four congressmen are expected to be reelected with little difficulty. There still seems to be some question about whether Congressman Jackson B. Chase of Omaha will run again.

A formidable democratic candidate for congress from the second district, James Hart of Omaha, has now moved to New Jersey. Although Hart ran three times without success, he was always considered a threat. With him gone the republicans may be able to breathe easier in that district which includes Omaha and five counties along the Missouri river.

On the statehouse level the indications are that most of the present office holders will seek reelection. A possible exception is Atty.-Gen. C. S. Beck, who reportedly has had plans to run for district court judge in his hometown of North Platte.

Beck's plans may have taken a jolt with the filing for reelection of Judge Isaac Nisley of North Platte. It was said that Beck's plans hinged on Nisley's retirement.

State officials who would have to seek reelection next year to continue in office are Gov. Victor Anderson, State Auditor Ray Johnson, State Treasurer Ralph Hill, Lieutenant Gov. Charles Warner, Secretary of State Frank Marsh and State Railway Commissioner Paul Pettygrove.

Anderson's Position—Up to a few weeks ago Governor Anderson seemed to have the clearest sailing possible to any easy reelection. It is much too early to tell now but the growing seriousness of the state penal institution situation is a cloud on his horizon.

The most comfortable reassurance for Governor Anderson is that there appears to be no outstanding rival on either the republican or democrat scene. If he were in a close race, the troubles at the state penitentiary and state reformatory might hurt him. But as of this early date a strong opponent doesn't seem to be in the cards.

Considerable significance however, was attached by political observers to the fact that Frederick Wagener, Lincoln attorney, was retained by George Morris, ousted state reformatory superintendent.

Morris has demanded a public hearing by the state board of control on why he was fired. Under the law the board must produce its reasons and give Morris the hearing. However, the board itself is the final judge and there is no appeal from its findings after the hearing.

Wagner Build-up—Wagner, it will be remembered, ran against Anderson in the 1954 gubernatorial primary. Although Anderson overran him, friends of Wagner, say he still has ambitions for the governor's chair.

The forthcoming public hearing before the board of control could take on considerable political importance.

Wagner's major handicap in running against Anderson might be that he is also a Lincoln man and other areas of the state might not like perpetuating Lincoln control of the governorship.

Those who spot possible political ambitions on the part of Wagner point to a paragraph in a statement he made at the time it was announced he would be counsel for Morris.

Wagner stated that Morris "has been more right than any individual having any semblance of authority or assumed authority over and of our Nebraska state institutions."

Since Anderson has taken authority of the state penitentiary during two of the riots, the statement appeared to include him in the broad criticism.

There had been talk that the democrats might try to take advantage of the institution troubles. But the Wagner entrance into the case gave indications that it might become an intramural bone of contention among the republicans themselves.

Feeder's Woes—

Nebraska livestock feeders were beginning to have the notion that they were being "sold down the river" in favor of the corn farmers. Because of the poor corn crop this year, feeders are having trouble getting feed. Leaders of feeders groups wondered why some of the stored government corn couldn't be sold at market prices. Howard Dogett, representative of the U.S. department of agriculture, told a special committee appointed by Gov. Anderson that this couldn't be done. That corn farmers wouldn't like it seemed to be the explanation. Feeders felt that the fact there are more corn farmers than feeders and that corn is price supported while beef isn't might have helped turn the scales against them.

Power Dilemma—

Governor Anderson's proposal to have a committee of distinguished citizens seek an answer to the electric power controversy got the cold shoulder from most of Nebraska's public power districts. Only Consumers Public Power district expressed approval. With a financial structure that would obtain the best interest rate on a bond sale and with an eagerness to get into the power production business, Consumers apparently feared no such investigation.

Other districts, who feel Consumers should be restricted to power distribution only, weren't so warm to the idea.

In the background lurked the possibility that the legislature might have to be called to get something done. This and the threat that a state agency might be set up to control the power districts may be the way to drive the warring factions into harmony, some observers felt.
