Tiny Nosebags

A friend of ours in his paper last week called attention to a collection of typos which was compiled by a professor in the University of Kentucky school of journalism, who faithfully waded through wedding stories in a number of newspapers to gather the following samples:

"The bride was given in marriage by her father, wearing her mother's wedding gown. The couple went to high school together and their marriage will stop a romance begun there. The bride wore a strand of tiny pearls. Her gown was vile green. Her accessories were plain pink. The bridegroom's mother was at-tired in a lace dress which fell to the floor. The maid of honor wore yellow tulle. The brides-maids carried tiny nosebags. The flower girl wore a maize gown with puffed sleeves touch-ing her ankles. The bride's tulle-der wore a dawn blue chiffon and a black tulle hat. The nuptials took place in a setting illuminated by lighted Roman candles. The couple exchanged their cows. The bridal couple then passed out and greeted the guests. The ceremony was at-tended by only a few loose friends and relatives."

Learning to Write

When your kindergarten child asks you to show him how to print his name, better consult his teacher first so she can show you his name in manuscript writing. Manuscript printing is the method now used. Many teachers are obliged to "re-teach" children on printing the child's name after the child has entered school. Manuscript printing is not actually writing but is similar to printing and is employed in the first books issued to modern kindergartners. Most parents use all capital letters in a child's name, such as MARY. This is not what is being done today in schools.
