and Lee Kmrcek. Third place went to the Eagle Hustlers 4-H club of Page; team members Bob Beclert, Lyle Heiss and Gary Bowen.

In addition to the ribbons the State Association of Soil Conservation Districts awarded to the three top scoring youths a range book, "Grasses of the Great Plains" by Weaver and Albertson. The three high adults were awarded a year's membership to the American Society of Range Management. Awards were presented by George Wiseman, chairman of that organization and manager of the Valentine wildlife refuge.

This contest was patterned after the soil judging contests but has been adapted to fit range conditions, particularly in the sandhills region of Nebraska. Don Burzlaff, extension range specialist, was in charge of arrangements for the contest. The development of the score card was worked out jointly in cooperation with other range specialists. The contest consisted of four parts. The first part was the identification and classification of 20 range plants common to this area. The second part required the contestant to determine the degree of use of the contest site. The third part called for the determination of the range site and condition class. The last part was the recommendations for the possible treatment to improve the range.

A range specialist for the soil conservation service, Lorenz Bredemeier, and Dean Higgins were present to conduct the training session in the morning and to assist with the summary of the contest after the contestants had turned in their papers.

Walter Pick, high scoring adult, lives 8 miles southeast of Inman and owns and operates a 2,700-acre ranch. He attributes his success in this contest to practical experience and "35 years in the saddle." He says that good range management is the most important phase of successful ranch operation.

The contest was held on the Neil Ryan ranch located 4 1/2 miles west of O'Neill. The O'Neill Chamber of Commerce served refreshments at the close of the contest.

Plans are being made to hold another such contest for the sandhills area this summer. It is to be held at Halsey some time in August.
