Swimming Once for Men, Boys

Pioneers Splashed in Buffalo Wallow

During these hot summer days, Nebraskans by the thousands take advantage of modern versions of the "old swimming hole." The increasing number of fine swimming pools to be found throughout Nebraska provide significant additions to the state's recreational facilities, and illustrate another area in which present day Nebraskans are much better off than were their pioneer forebears.

During the pioneer period, swimming was a sport generally reserved for men and boys. Bathing suits usually were provided by nature, but the seclusion offered by the average swimming hole provided adequate privacy.

Buffalo wallows, ponds, creeks and rivers served as swimming holes. Conditions, particularly in the buffalo wallows and the ponds, were far from sanitary, but young and old splashed about in sometimes mucky, stagnant pools, completely oblivious of their germ-laden surroundings.

Sometimes the girls went swimming, too. Mollie Sanford Dorsey, who lived near Tecumseh, wrote the following in her diary for July 27, 1867:

"About the only employment we have now outside of our housework, is to help to destroy the potato bugs that are eating up the vines. That, and playing in the creek to keep cool. We are tanned awfully and look a little rough. I know. The little boys have been, for sport, besmearing their faces with the black mud that settles in the bottom of the creek. They discovered it took the tan and sunburn off. We hailed the discovery with delight for here was a cosmetic so available and cheap as dirt."

"So one day last week we donned our bathing suits and sneaked off to the creek. Doing our heads up in cotton handkerchiefs to save our hair from contact, we plastered our faces thickly over with the black mud and sat on the banks for it to take effect. Although we found ourselves a few shades whiter, I think we will not try it again soon."

Frequently the newspapers carried accounts of drowning. The Missouri was particularly treacherous.

Generally, pioneer Nebraskans had a difficult time of it trying to find a good swimming hole.
