Rail Construction In Northern Quebec

To create a grade for the railroad on sidehill in the Cran River Valley of Northern Quebec, Canadian National Railway construction engineers set off a blast of seven and one-half tons of dynamite in 21-foot deep holes.

Just below the 60th parallel in Northern Quebec the woods echo with the bark of the diesel-powered bulldozer and the clang of the railroad track layer. The Canadian National Railway's newest branch line, a 290-mile arc swinging from Beattyville through the Chibougamau mining camp to Lake St. John, is well underway. Steel has now reached a point 50 miles from Chibougamau.

Canadian National hasn't waited for the whole line to open before serving a small planing mill near Beattyville and also handling pulpwood. It is not intended to let commercial operations interfere with the movement of construction men and material, however. The 158 miles of railroad into Chibougamau will be in operation next spring.

Work commenced on the eastern half of the line—St. Felicien to Chibougamau, 135 miles—last fall when a contract was let to clear the right-of-way from St. Felicien to Lake Chigoubiche, roughly half way.

While the clearing contract is completed, grading has proved a tougher problem. For a portion of the picturesque valley of the Cran River which the line follows for 20 miles, the grade takes to the sidehill. Considerable rock blasting is involved. The actual crossing of the Cran, 26 miles west of St. Felicien, is a major work involving a two-span bridge 80 feet above water.

Although the mining camp at Chibougamau has attracted the lion's share of attention in the area, there is a potential of more than 12 million cords of wood adjacent to the new line. At its St. Felicien end there is opportunity, too, for farming in the tributary valleys running north.

The two pioneer areas of northern Quebec are Abitibi and Lake St. John. The new rail line is the connecting link that consolidates them and rolls back French Canada's northern frontier. FWS

Weather Big Factor Today at Sale

Little hard to tell about the sale today (Thursday) because of Wednesday's severe weather. However, we had prospects for a nice sale. With the turn in the weather it is difficult to determine exactly what we will have. We had originally planned for 500-600 cattle.

Wednesday there were 85 in the yards—52 choice steers, 33 carrying the same brand. Also 22 in the yards, good useable 400-pound calves. Also 81 heifers—one-half choice blacks; 21 yearlings from Chambers; 16 cornfed 800-pound blacks; a lot of nice cows have been booked but whether they can get in today is a question.

Today might be a good day to be at the O'Neill market!
