Native Grass Seed Prospects 'Good'

Native grass seed harvest in Holt county holds prospects of being the largest in many years, according to C. R. ("Bob") Hill.

However, the damp weather made harvesting difficult on that crop as well as others. Most of the harvesting has been done and now many farmers and ranchers are in the process of re-cleaning their seed.

Seemingly the market for this seed has not been well established and although the supply is up, seedsmen are hesitant in setting a selling price at this time.

The Holt soil conservation district plans to continue the handling of locally harvested native grasses on a consignment basis. They feel by performing this service, locally produced seed can be kept in the area and used for seedlings next spring.

Locally harvested native grass seed is adapted and will grow better and produce more forage than seed moved out of its natural climatic conditions.
