'Pea' Aphids Are Busy in Region

Here's a nasty little word that is causing plenty of conversation and considerable apprehension for farmers in this section of Nebraska: Aphids.

Little green aphids in vetch, clover, alfalfa, peas, tomatoes and lettuce; red aphids in roses; other aphids on cornroots and even strawberry roots.

Aphids can become a serious pest and cause total damage. The reason they can become so destructive is their ability to reproduce in such large numbers so quickly.

In some aphid clans, the experts say, every one is a female and these females lay from five to 20 young in a single day. The young, in turn, are capable of reproducing in another five to 10 days.

The result of such a buildup in population that control becomes difficult and sometimes impractical.

For control the state extension service recommends the use of malathion. When used on vegetables such as beans, one should wait seven days before eating the vegetables. By following directions on the container, one can be safe.

The number one question being fired at county extension people and others who are supposed to know is this: What will the green (or pea) aphid do to the alfalfa and vetch?

Hot weather, which moved in to the area Friday and Saturday, will help stop the cycle and also aid those using chemicals to control the pesky young'ins.
