Best Rodeo Hands Will Be in Action

Movie, TV Version Is Not Accurate

What is a cowboy? By the movies, and more recently in some remarkable hues—as a saloon-dwelling gun slinger, a guitar-picking covered bowler, an embroidery-clothed horse, a horse-kissing woman hater.

All of these things he very definitely is no. And Holt county fairgoers on the two final days—Wednesday and Thursday, August 20-21—will see some of America's best cowboys in action. Originally the western cowboy was exactly what his name implies: a working cattleman.

Once or twice a year maybe on the Fourth of July or Labor Day, he'll haul his rope horse to town and enter a rodeo. If he wins, he'll likely try his luck at another farther down the road. Winning there, he may go to rodeoing the year around.

As rodeo, the cowboy's part-time sport, has matured and prospered, it has created a new and growing group of cowboys—real cowboys—the rodeo hands. They compete the year around and live primarily off their winnings.

Rodeo is now a professional sport, with a room for any kid from anywhere with the guts and the ability to make it pay. But no matter where he comes from once a man gets into rodeo, he becomes a cowboy. He wears western clothes exclusively. And, almost invariably, whatever he can save of his winnings he salts away to invest in a ranch and cattle.

Ever since Owen Wister wrote "The Virginian," generations of Americans have pictured the cowboy as a lean hipped, tall walking, rugged individualist, quick to answer a smile, quicker to correct an insult. The impression is not far wrong.

The rodeo cowboy is no boot scuffing, blushing country boy. He's one of the most traveled citizens of this land, crossing it from coast to coast and border to border several times a year in his pursuit of prize money. He competes as readily for a hundred-dollar day money in Buckeye, Ariz., as for the hundred thousand won each year at Madison Square Garden.

He's no wastrel, because a man who makes his living outwitting broncs and wrestling steers has to stay in shape and sharp. But he likes to live. And he's equally at home drinking 'til dawn in a stand up saloon in Red Lodge, Mont., or squiring a show girl at Toots Shor's in Manhattan.

As a bachelor, he's a gay blade, living it up from Boston, Mass., to Barstow, Calif. But as a family man, with an average of three children, he's a good husband and a fond father, who often drives 1,000 miles out of his way between rodeos to spend one day at home with his wife and kids.

He's quick to make a friend and seldom loses the friends he makes. But among strangers, he minds his own business. On the average, he's in his late twenties. Bronc riders start losing their winning lick about 30, most ropers and doggers quit before 40. He entered his first rodeo, on the average, when he was 17.

His winnings won't make him rich. If he's a champion, a top money winner, he'll average $30,000 a year. If he's a kid getting started, he'll win perhaps a tenth of that, and will have to rely on his friends for entry fees and living expenses during the lean weeks of the year-long season. He knows no financial security and he seeks none, preferring instead the freedom of the suicide circuit as it is.

He knows no salary, no appearance money, no guarantees. His only income is what he can win and he pays his own expenses wherever he goes, pay an average $50 entry fee wherever he competes. But he competes where he pleases and when he pleases. He can be killed in an instant, or crippled for life by a kicking hoof or a driving horn. He's seen it happen to his friends—perhaps two or three a year.

He'll suffer a bad break, a leg, a rib or maybe his neck an average of once every four years. But he'll be back to pay his entry and ride again long before the doctors agree the break is healed. He'll never be out of the saddle, or straight—and he smokes. But most often, on the ranch or in the arena, he chews.

He curses like a man should, but never in front of a lady. He's polite with ladies and strangers, but a tiger when wronged—and a mighty tough man to fight. In the arena, he'll help the men who beat him, hazing for his rivals in steer wrestling, advising other bronc riders where to take the rein on a horse they've drawn for the first time. It never occurs to him that he might improve his own chances by hazing the steer badly or lying about the rein.

He makes his living in the one professional sport that has never had a major scandal and probably never will, a sport that worries little about cheating because few men ever try, few of the animals, drawn by lot, can be fixed. He knows the score, that he may get a little glory but he'll never get rich, that he could be dead or crippled tomorrow, that he'll be all through for certain at an age when most men are just beginning to taste success.

He's a cowboy. He's a rodeo hand—and proud of it.

Train-Savers File Another Legal Step The Save-the-Trains association Monday filed another legal document with the Nebraska supreme court in its battle to reinstate Chicago & North Western passenger trains 13 and 14 between Omaha and Chadron.

The association filed a transcript of Douglas county district court proceedings and a notice of appeal from that court's dismissal of an action seeking to reinstate the two trains.

The association also has filed contempt-of-court proceedings against the railroad in supreme court on the grounds the trains were taken off without a mandate from that court. This will be considered this fall when the court reconvenes.
