State Capitol News—Which Roads First Thorn for Demos, Too Invariably Trouble for Governors

LINCOLN—The problem of Nebraska roads, especially which ones to build first, could be a thorn to the democratic administration.

Roads have been a trouble spot for many years and for many governors. In the recent election, wage rates on them, set by the state highway department, strongly agitated Nebraska unions who went all out to defeat Gov. Victor Anderson.

Now a new item has been injected into the controversy—the matter of the sufficiency system. State Engineer L. N. Ress said the law requires that the system—under which roads are rated by engineering standards to determine construction priority—be used only when "practical."

This could pave the way for the "spoils" system in future administrations, the engineer said. He added there has been considerable apprehension about this throughout the state.

The state advisory highway commission reaffirmed its policy of improving roads through use of the system. State Sen. Terry Carpenter of Scottsbluff made a comment on the rating method which drew fire of State Senator-elect John Cooper of Humboldt.

Cooper charged Carpenter has said the present system of building roads is a lot of "bunk." The truth is, Cooper continued, that competent men have spent a great deal of time and effort originating the program. He said Gov. Victor Anderson has followed the system religiously.

The role State Engineer Ress will play in the democratic administration is one for speculation. He has irked unions, and unions helped elect Ralph Brooks governor.

A multi-million dollar road program of considerable magnitude is underway, actually, and on the drawing boards. It will take a competent person to pick up the threads if Ress is replaced.

The other alternative is to soothe the ire of unions through a change in attitude by Ress and thus keep him as engineer. That is one of the many problems that will face Brooks if and when he is sworn into office.

Official returns of the election, which Brooks claimed as a result of unofficial counting, will not be known until December 1.

1959 Legislature—

Many veteran observers predict a hot session of the 1959 legislature. It is faced with many problems, the most important of which concerns taxes.

That matter boils down to whether lawmakers want to keep or scrap the state property tax systems. If they decide to retain the property tax the problem will be to pass laws that can be enforced.

State Sen. Terry Carpenter of Scottsbluff said he intends to work hard toward that end and if the legislature doesn't pass laws to his liking and if the governor, whoever he may be, does not aid in the situation, Carpenter will run for governor in 1960.

He made the announcement at the biennial meeting of the legislative council. Carpenter said the statement was not a "threat" merely a truthful recitation of his political intentions.

The council, composed of all senators who work as committees studying state problems between sessions, got a report from one of its committees making no recommendations on a sales or income tax.
