Cal Stewart Departs On European Journey
Carroll (Cal) Stewart editor-publisher of The Frontier for 13 years departed Saturday from O'Neill for various points in Europe to complete research on a non-fiction historical book, "Black Sunday," which is scheduled to be published next year.

Stewart and his family have been residing here while he has done extensive traveling to interview survivors of the U. S. Air Force's famous low-level B-24 heavy bomber mission to Ploesti, Rumania. The Libyan-based four-engine bombers attacked Germany's major source of oil and gas on August 1, 1943.

Co-author of the forthcoming book is James Dugan, who has written "The Great Iron Ship," "Man Under the Sea" and "Undersea Explorer," all by Harper & Brothers, and the 1957 Academy Award documentary film, "The Silent World," by Columbia pictures.

Stewart three times delayed his trip to Europe while endeavoring, through correspondence, to locate Germans who were defenders of the vital enemy oil installations. He says "Black Sunday" needs human interest testimony from the former enemy to work in with intimate testimony of the Americans who flew the treacherous mission. "It's a needle in a haystack proposition," Stewart said Saturday as he prepared to leave. Two former Luftwaffe generals (one was chief of staff of the Ploesti defense sector) have agreed to turn over diaries and papers for Stewart's research and one former Luftwaffe fighter pilot, who shot down several of the Liberators, have invited Stewart into their homes to reconstruct the mission from the defense side. "They have offered to lead me to other German anti-aircraft and fighter pilot survivors," The O'Neill man said.

Many of the Rumanian and German defenders of Ploesti were captured 14 months after the mission when the Russian armies moved in and haven't been heard from since.

"The work load and time consumed are twice what I'd estimated," Stewart explained. "Cooperation has been grand in all quarters. And, strange as it may seem, the testimony is largely corroborative even though much of it comes almost 17 years after the deed."

Fifty-four U. S. bombers were shot down in a few minutes of high action over the refinery complexes that were transformed into an inferno. Over 1,800 Americans, mostly volunteers, undertook the mission that was intended to shorten the war one year. Many of the gas-laden bombers (it was a 2,400-mile roundtrip requiring extra fuel) were enveloped in flames; gas storage tanks exploded and spun into the air like tops; anti-aircraft batteries fired broadside into the bombers; some planes flew into explosions of delayed-action bombs; one bomber crash-landed in a woman's prison barracks and cremated 68 women as well as the 10-man crew. Over four-hundred Americans were killed on the mission, many of whom Stewart and
