What makes America Great?

(Last in a Series on the Declaration of Independence)

"we hold these truths to be self-evident..."

In all of their writings the Founding Fathers displayed a deep fear of strong government, and they intended that it should be held under control.

Washington said: "Government is like fire — a dangerous servant, a fearful master."

Jefferson said: "Free government is founded in jealousy and not in confidence. In questions of power, then, let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution."

The architects of the Declaration of Independence intended that government be the servant of man, not his master. "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

This final cornerstone of American government set forth the truth that government can have no greater rights than the people because its power comes from the people, and the people can take away that power.

The American system of government is based on the noblest of principles and ideals. It is the only system under which freedom has been able to flourish because its foundations are the God-given rights of man.
