Even the Liberals of the Administration are worried, but they stick to their old remedy: spend more money. Conservatives and moderates are convinced this has proved unsuccessful in the past, and has already hurt the American economy a great deal.

In the long fight against Communism, our best weapon is a sound, energetic economy.

In that connection, Congress man Judd made this statement on the floor of the House, giving his opposition stand to the Administration's Omnibus Housing Bill, which was subsequently passed.

"I am going to vote for the substitute (continuing the present Housing Program)," said Rep. Judd, "primarily for other reasons that I have heard discussed. Last month the President called the House and Senate into a special session to which he came personally, to underline the seriousness of the Communist threat to our very existence, and to tell us we must increase appropriations for certain essential weapons if we are going to avert disaster."

"If we do not spend more and more for arms, we are told, we invite insecurity—and disaster. If we do spend more and more for arms—and also for everything else that we would like to have now—we make sure a renewal of inflation—and disaster."

"This is why Mr. Khrushchev is so confident he will win."

"He is convinced we are already too soft to be willing to discipline ourselves to put first things first. It is not a choice between good and bad programs. It is between what is first and what is second. Survival is a deadly war is first."
