Going on a vacation - now or later? For most of us, this means two weeks or longer with a vacant house left behind. Burglars prefer it that way. To forestall these visitors, make your house look occupied. Here are some ideas to make it look that way.

Tell the newsboy to stop delivering that paper while you're away. A stack of unread newspa pers on the porch is a sure-fire message that no one's home. Is the mail piling up in the mailbox? Another giveaway, for obviously, if someone were home, the letters would have been taken out. Have mail at the post office; or ask a neighbor to take it and to pick up any circulars' dropped at your front door.

Don't announce your vacation plans in the social columns until after your trip. This is a real invitation to trouble. You've assured would-be burglars you won't interrupt their haul.

Never leave a key in the mailbox or a note telling your prospective guest where to find a key to get into your house. Burglars can read too, you know! Your best bet is to deliver the key to your guests beforehand, or have them pick it up at a neighbor's if they are to arrive while you are gone.

Do tell your neighbors you'll be gone and for how long. If the house is to be vacant, it's better your neighbors know it, so if they see anyone in it, they'll know something is wrong and call the

So now your house has a nicely occupied look. Someone might try to break in anyway. How to stop them? Be sure you have good locks on all outside doors. The "dead lock," or double lock" variety can be operated only with its special key, which must be turned to open the door and lock it properly. It takes an added few seconds of your time when you're leaving the house, but it pays off in added protection.

Locking windows is very important and frequently overlooked. Even though there are ways of cutting the glass and breaking it very quietly, securely locked windows and well-locked screens or storm windows discourage burglars from trying to enter this way. Be sure to give the same attention to basement and secondstory windows.

Keep ladders and tools locked in the garage, or stored away be-"unauthorized" reach. Cha grined victims often find they supplied the ladder and tools used as jimmies. Why make it easy for a burglar?

Now suppose you've taken the proper precautions and someone breaks in anyway. How can you protect your valuables? See that they are not there. Your jewelry, important papers, and similar valuables should be kept in a safety-box at the bank.

How about hiding things in your home? Don't! Don't pin a brooch inside a dress, for instance, or fasten a necklace inside a hat. You might forget where you've put it and have a big-to-do with the insurance company before it's found. Furthermore, any hiding place you can think of, a professional burglar has already thought of it. After all, that's his line of work!

To look at the worst side, let's say you've actually been robbed. It does happen, even though you think your house is burglar-resistant. Keep in mind that the average burglar is interested only in taking what he can dispose of easily and for good pricesthings like cameras, typewriters, furs, jewelry and unmonogrammed silver. There are serial numbers on many valuables-watches. cameras, typewriters, etc. Keep a list of these numbers. It can be a boon if you need to report a loss to police. If you're traveling by car, keep as little as possible in the back seat of your car. Put everything you can in the trunk-especially if you're going out of state. Burglars may see your outof-state plates, realize you're passing through and are probably in too much of a hurry to start a police action if something's miss ing from your car.
