Report from Washington By Congressman Dave Marin

Fourth District, Nebraska

As this column is being written there are indications that a show down battle in the Congress is shaping up over the Administration's foreign aid program. The President's request for some $8.8 billion for development loans is one of the most controversial items in his proposal, for he has requested authorization for a five-year period with funds to be made available to the Administration by borrowing directly from the U. S. Treasury ("back door" financing), rather than through annual Congressional appropriations.

In the past I have often expressed opposition to the increased use of "back door" financing methods by the Executive Branch which bypass the regular Congressional appropriations procedures. This "gimmick"-to my way of thinking-to avoid Congressional scrutiny is particularly dangerous in connection with foreign aid programs.

In order to give you a better picture of the developing battle over foreign aid, it may be helpful to outline briefly the legislative process involved. As a rule, separate and distinct bills must be enacted into law before Federal funds can actually be expended for any program either foreign or domestic. First, a measure to authorize the program must be reported by the appropriate legislative committees and then passed by the Congress.

Following Congressional approval of the program, a bill providing for the authorization of funds to carry out the program must be enacted. Legislation dealing with the expenditure of Federal funds must originate in the House and is cleared through the Appropriations Committee. Under our fiscal system, with annual tax collections and annual budgets, appropriations are made by Congress on an annual basis, although the authorization for a program can, and often does, cover a period of two or more years. Nevertheless, the Department administering the program must appear each year before the Appropriations Committees and justify its request for funds to continue the program for the ensuing year.

The House Foreign Operations Subcommittee recently conducted an investigation of the foreign aid program in Peru. We are advised that the subcommittee experienced great difficulty in obtaining necessary documents and information. However, according to a Member of Congress assigned to that subcommittee, they were finally able to obtain sufficient facts which led to the following conclusions on two major aspects of the Peru program:

"1. Out of 106,000 tons of grain (cost to U. S. taxpayers, $14 million) sent to Peru for drought relief, there was only evidence to show that 5.7% of the grain was actually distributed free to hungry drought victims. A large portion of the remainder was sold by the local government into regular commercial channels, and at least a part of the proceeds were used to purchase real estate and to construct houses which were then sold to some of the local leading citizens at prices below cost.

"2. A $2 million loan made to Peru in 1959 was intended to aid their new home.

Those marvelous automatic drycleaners have arrived - selfservice machines you operate like an automatic washer. While you wait, your load is clean, dry and comes out ready to wear.

Self-service drycleaning is so fast and inexpensive that everyone in your family can wear good woolens and fine non-washable fabrics again-and keep them beautifully new and clean.

Pleats and creases stay put. Most garments can be worn immediately. Very few take a little touch-up with a steam iron. There is no "cleaning odor."

The cost is about one-fourth of usual drycleaning costs. Never before was it so economical, so fast, and so much fun to do all your cleaning and laundry!

Nine dresses or 4 men's suits make a typical load or 10 sweaters or a big bedspread-or 8 lbs. of dry weight.
