RE-ELECT HOWARD MANSON

for
Clerk of the District Court

Technical services require special training. The indexing, filing and issuing of proper writs, based upon pleadings filed in the office of CLERK OF THE DISTRICT COURT are highly technical services. Upon assuming the duties of this office, Manson realized that and promptly enrolled for a correspondence law course. After long, tedious study he has completed it. Professional personal working with such office fully appreciate this.

Weed Control In Wet Cornfields

How to get weed control when fields are too wet for cultivation has long been a problem for every farmer who plants corn. However, today, thanks to science, there is a way. Throughout the Midwest new weed control chemicals are taking over the job of keeping weeds out of corn. These herbicides are applied once, at the time corn is planted, and provide weed control throughout the growing season, whether or not fields are too wet to cultivate.

As the result of modernized weed control practices, the farmer derives many other extra benefits as well. Authorities report that farmers using herbicides such as Atrazine or Simazine have more free time for making quality hay at the peak of nutritive value, planting soybeans, or doing other farm work that should be done on time, but in the past has been delayed when time for first cultivation arrived. Yields are higher with modern weed control methods, and the extra bushels more than pay for the cost of materials and application.

Based upon performance and use in Midwest corn areas for several years, modern weed killers are here to stay. With weed control now being taken care of chemically, a rainy day is just like any other day when it comes to keeping weeds out of corn. In fact, modern herbicides are referred to by some experts as a kind of wet weather "insurance"—or at least as close to insurance as you can get. More information on chemical weed control in corn may be obtained by writing Geigy Agricultural Chemicals, Department WN, Saw Mill River Road, Ardsley, New York.
