Young Family Finds 'New Life' in Electrically-Heated Home

It took Byron (Barney) Willman nine months to build the new family home at 4003 Thirteenth Street in Columbus. . . He contracted it himself and formed work parties of in-laws and friends. But the Willmans now have year-around living comfort for years to come—their home is all-electric, including use of flameless electric heat!

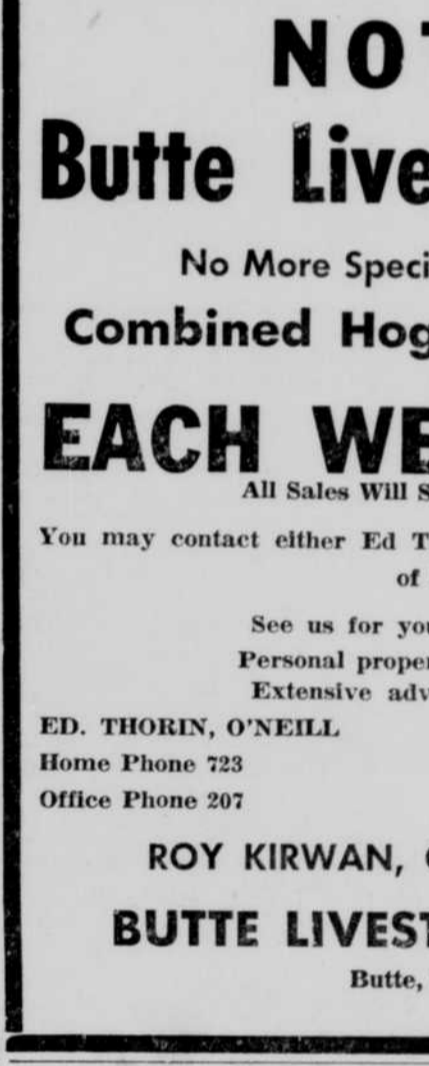

"I couldn't go back to old-style heating," says Colleen Willman. "Why I dust so seldom . . . And the heat is so even . . . you can't explain the differences until you've lived with electric heat."

Barney, who is assistant to the City Engineer in Columbus, likes the individual room controls. "We can keep the house at 72 degrees or less—except for the kids' bedrooms. Seems you get better heating results at lower temperatures with electric heat."

The Willman's 1,477 square foot Cape Cod home is cooled with a 1-ton window air-conditioning unit. This is possible because of the good insulation in the home.

Why don't you investigate flameless electric heating? More than 1,500 Nebraskans know it and like it. Call your public power agency today.

Now! A Light Refreshing Beer That Doesn't Short-Change You on Flavor.

Most people like a light, refreshing beer because it's pleasant going down and less filling when it gets there. But they often feel short-changed when it comes to flavor. No need to anymore. Now you can get lightness and flavor both, in one great beer. Storz Premium Pilsener, brewed with toasted malt. Two years ago Storz set out to find a way to brew a light, refreshing beer that would have more flavor than light beers usually have. Toasted malt proved to be the answer. A Storz discovery that adds to the flavor without adding to the heaviness of the body. They were wrong. You can brew a light refreshing beer with out sacrificing flavor. You do it by toasting the malt. The first and only toasted malt beer is now available at stores and taverns, in bottles, cans, and glass cans . . . in six packs and cases. Take some home and enjoy it. Storz Premium Pilsener. The light refreshing beer with robust flavor.
