apist, an occupational therapist and a rehabilitation nurse.

All stroke patients, members of their families, nursing home personnel and all persons interested in rehabilitation are sincerely invited to attend this worth while program.

Today's greater medical understanding is beginning to be reflected in a more hopeful and optimistic attitude on the part of those who live with or care for the stroke patient. Some knowledge of how strokes occur, how the doctors treat them and the part families and friends can play in recovery and rehabilitation may help develop a more constructive approach in a critical situation.

Once a stroke has occurred, the most important step in current treatment is development of a sound rehabilitation program that will help the patient live and work again to his utmost capacity.

There are three essential and vital points for effective rehabilitation. First, begin therapy as soon as possible; second, cooperation of the doctor, patient and family; and third, that the doctor and family call on other sources in the community to help in the rehabilitation.
