People will buy anything of course. J. Lloyd Phillips has developed an unexpected market for cow chips, once known as the anthracite of the plains. He gets $3 apiece for them.

Once a Dallas man, Mr. Phillips now runs a fishing camp in Marble Falls. His spare time he devotes to the arts. He grinds up colored glass from bottles in which his customers carry their various medicines, makes paintings of the glass and paints pictures. He makes handicraft articles, some of which he sells at his camp.

One day he came upon an ancient cow chip and his artistic impulse was aroused. He sealed it with a shellac bath, sprayed it with gold paint and put it on display mostly as a gag. A woman visitor asked whether she might buy it. Phillips tried to dissuade her by naming the astronomical price of $3.

The woman bought it instantly. "I am going to give it to my husband," she said. Mr. Phillips is now in limited production on this gift item. He has already sold half a dozen, though once when he wasn't looking, Mrs. Phillips mistakenly lent one of them to go for $2.—Paul Crune in Dallas News.
