WHAT SHALL WE WEAR?

FASHIONS OF THE DAY AS REPRESENTED AT HOME AND ABROAD.

All About the New Parasols, Including Those Covered with Smoked Silk, Muslin, Lace, Brocade and Flowers—A Variety of Styles in Sticks and Handles.

As to parasols, their name is truly legion, for one scarcely sees two alike. The newest white ones of smoked silk, drawn muslin, lace or brocade, have white enameled sticks, with balls of ivory, set in gilt, or large heads of enameled gold. A few parasols are composed of large petals of muslin laid over each other; others have a full frayed ruche around the edge (the shot en-tous-cas and Indian silk ones have this also), or a row of ferns or leaves laid on just inside the edge, on the lining, or a spray of flowers or leaves sewn on at the ferrule, and again close to the edge. Flows of small and most natural looking shamrock leaves, nestled in lace, adorn the exterior of some parasols. A row of shaded ribbon loops, laid partially over each other, is sometimes placed round the edge, corresponding with the colors of the group of flowers placed near the ferrule. This is being done in all shades, but yellow, mauve and pink look particularly well. Some muslin parasols have a design of crossed keys over them; others are square shaped, but the generality are round. Many are lined with shot silk.

Some of the floral parasols have a peculiar effect when carried closed. These look as if the owner had been cutting for herself a large posy and fixed it on a stick, in the style of a May day posy of long ago. The impression is still further carried out when a florally trimmed hat to match is worn—is often the case. The parasol represented in the cut is made of very pale sage green silk or satin, and the handle of ivory or silver is finely engraved with a floral design. The ribs are partly covered with roses of a delicate flesh tint, producing an exquisite and harmonious color effect on the silk foundation.

The long walking stick handles, with solid silver heads, are very fashionable, and so are the plain, dark varnished bamboo sticks, with plain tops. Some eccentric sticks have lately appeared. They are of unvarnished wood, and there are three horse's heads issuing from the stick and standing out in proud and independent consciousness, or two or only one. Then there are three dogs' heads cut out in the same way, two or one. They are generally of the same class, but one stick has a greyhound and a pug's head, colored together with a metal band, while another has a spaniel and pug. A climbing bear, carved in the brown wood of the stick, is another design, while a different one has three distinct sticks of two inches or so, capped with silver, branching from the parent stick, in the same style as the horses' and dogs' heads. A handle of carved ivory, tipped with gold, held a beautiful white silk parasol, with painted sections, and a white ostrich feather carried down each rib of the frame.

Fashions in Boots and Shoes. The fashionable evening shoes do not necessarily have very high heels, but they all have pointed toes. The new bows are made simple and very close to the foot. Some of the bows are entirely covered with spangles in silver and gold, some with tiny diamonds, which sparkled and had a good effect. The shoes can be made to copy the color or design of any brocade, and iridescent beads and metallic threads of many tones are employed. Bridal shoes have diamonds, or the semblance of diamonds, intermixed with pearls, or are worked in silver with designs such as hills of the valley.

For house shoes Russian leather in all its colors is worn so that these shoes can match the dresses.

Numbered with novelties in out door shoes are those made of glazed kid and patent leather toes. The gilded Oxford tie is also worn. A decided novelty is the shoe made in patent black leather and white buckskin brogue.

With regard to boots, those with kid uppers and patent leather vamps are much worn; the toes must be pointed. Buttoned cloth boots, with kid or patent leather vamps, are also in fashion, especially if the cloth uppers match in color the gown with which the boots are worn.

But there is another kind of boot for which women have a demand—viz., riding boots. For the park, high Wellington patent leather are worn; for hunting, the Bedford cord tops, as then the habit will not ride up on their account.

Traveling Costumes. The traveling season being at hand, our readers are presented in this issue with a stylish London garment, equally adapted for rain and dust. As will be observed in studying the cut, this wrap is not only an admirable protector of the dress worn underneath it, but it is an exceedingly graceful affair.

An English Traveling Wrap. In London this wrap is known as the Ross Inverness. The mantle is kept close to the figure by means of an inner band. The wings are fitted with straps either for rests for the hands or to keep the wings from flying open.
