MINING, LUMBERING AND SALMON FISHING OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Down in the Coal Mine—Under the Waters of the Bay—in the Great Woods—Handling Logs 14 Feet Thick—Catching and Canning Salmon—The British Indians.

[Special Correspondence.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 27.—One must go to the far west to realize what this continent was like in its infancy. There he will see the beginnings of man's struggle for wealth and natural surroundings which seem to have remained untouched since the dawn of creation...

Under the shining bosom of the lovely bay of Nanaimo, on Vancouver Island, the workings of the mines extend for miles, and hundreds of men descend the shaft day after day and night after night to find the coal and iron which form the cargoes of those masted ships for sea sailing away over the rippling waters...

No greater contrast to the scenes we have left behind us in the mine could be imagined than those which we behold in visiting one of the many logging camps which are planted along the coast near the new city of Vancouver.

The various processes employed in covering, soldering and sealing the cans are ingeniously contrived, and it is astonishing with what rapidity they are passed on from stage to stage.

The Indians of British Columbia are noted as the most industrious of their race, a fact which may be partly accounted for by the opportunities afforded them in the fisheries of the Fraser. Those inhabiting the northwest territories are, for the most part, in a condition of squalid misery...

hitched to a steamer, is towed to the sawing and planing mill for which it is destined. Here the logs are kraaled in a water inclosure, specially adapted to receive them, till they are wanted. When they are, you see men with long poles hopping over the water from log to log, and finally cutting out their favorite victims for the saw.

A visit to the canneries of the Fraser river is sufficient to dispel the prejudice so commonly entertained against canned fish, for everything connected with the process of canning is made and kept as clean as the contents of a model dairy.

The Indians of British Columbia are noted as the most industrious of their race, a fact which may be partly accounted for by the opportunities afforded them in the fisheries of the Fraser.

Frank R. Stockton, the author of 'The Lady of the Tiger,' is a small, wiry man with electric eyes and a swarthy complexion. He measures you in his mind's eye much as a tailor does, from tip to toe.

Anxiety's Ally. Mrs. Jones (with unopened letter)—I wonder who it's from? Mr. Jones—You can quickly find out by opening it. Mrs. Jones—Yes, but I am enjoying the anxiety of suspense.—New York World.

Miss Dusky—Am dem de black stockin's you tote me 'bout buyin'? Miss Staffron—Yes, dem is de ones, Cleely, an' dey only cos' seventy-f' cents. Miss Dusky—Am dey silk? Miss Staffron—Not 'actly, but dey're jes' as good. Miss Dusky—An' will dey wash? Miss Staffron—Dat I don' know; I've only had 'em fo' weeks!—The Epoch.

HE LEFT THEN. An Interesting Poker Story with an Abrupt End.

They were sitting in a hotel corridor, and an old man, who spoke in an intense but deliberate manner, was telling of a great poker game. As the story went on his listeners drew their chairs closer around the narrator.

There was an intense strain in the absorbed silence of the group now. The man drew a long breath. Another moved uneasily in his chair, but no one said a word.

Oh, then the train stopped at my station and I had to get off.—New York Tribune.

A Chilly Evening. Illustration of a man and a woman sitting at a table.

Unwelcome Suitor—That's a lovely song! It always carries me away. She—if I had known how much pleasure it could give us both, I should have sung it earlier in the evening.

A Friend and Benefactor. 'Confound your awkwardness!' groaned the man whose corns had been stepped on.

Miss Lou, instead of, as stated, falling below the sale of his other books, has sold nearly 5,000 more largely than any of his previous novels in the same time.
