Lincoln's long anticipated pleasure of seeing a real live president in her midst finally materialized Wednesday with the advent of that worthy executive's visit to this city.

It was a big day and although the stay was altogether too brief and lasted but an hour, yet the day was set aside for the reception and little else was attended to during the balance of Wednesday. It was virtually a holiday and as such was in numerous instances finished. The decorations along the line of march were profuse and elegant and the crowds that fairly swarmed the thoroughfares through which the procession passed has never been equaled in this city. At the state house the multitude was so large that the immense grounds were a living mass of humanity, all tossing and surging to get near the speakers stand and many were even satisfied to get a peep at the distinguished visitor. Governor Thayer's and Mayor Weir's addresses of welcome were full of warmth and patriotic sentiment but owing to the size of the audience and the enthusiasm shown on all sides neither were heard more than twenty feet distant. President Harrison's address was somewhat louder and the fact that the noise had subsided somewhat when he began, made it possible for a few more to hear him. Time was too limited for an extended reception and accordingly no general handshaking was indulged in aside from the greeting between state officers, members of the press and the local committee having the various arrangements in charge. The train called in at nine o'clock in the morning and promptly at ten it again proceeded on its journey eastward with Omaha as the first stopping point. The reception was a great success in every particular and everything worked smoothly, especially when the brief time is taken into consideration and the committee is too be congratulated upon the splendid success achieved.

One of the many pleasing features on the program of Phantasma by the W. C. A. was the vocal solo, "Lo, Here! The Gentle Lark" by Mrs. Wadsworth. THREE GIRLS AND A GOAT. (NOT COUNTING THE DEER.)

By Jeremiah K. Jeremiah. Author of "Barberry, Thinkless Thoughts of a Thoughtless Thinker; Stay Age Land, a Story of the Ballet, Etc., Etc."

PREFACE. The chief beauty of this work lies in its lies and in the extent of its intellectuality. Other stories may be brighter, broader and better, but none will be as good. It is a veritable prize, and when one has won it once he will find he will be the possessor of a work of wild and delirious English humor that will last him through life, and another volume will be unnecessary. Georgiana, Harriet, Montana and G. Rome are not real. Neither is the Goat. All the other characters are. This, more than all its other charms, like G. Rome's hat, will be felt, and will lend additional heftiness to the moral. Lanson, 1848. J. K. J.

CHAPTER I. Three Imbeciles—Golden Texts—Beauty of Myself—You Take the Pills—We Agree to Go to Harlem—Montana Objects—We Go to Harlem. There were six of us, Georgiana, Wilhelmina, Harriet, Montana, G. Rome and the Goat. We were seated in my room chewing gum and talking about how bad we were—had from a moral point of view. This worried us, and we did not trouble about it. I am the best looking. My room is beautiful. The walls are covered with mottoes—God Bless Our Home, Take Smith's Biled Beans, Merry Christmas, Have You Used Bear's Soap? Good Luck to All, Chew Humdrum Plug—It is Beautiful. Harriet was reading a liver pill circular. It is her favorite form of literature. "You take the pills, we do the rest." Harriet thinks this is worthy of Ibsen. We decided to go on a trip. The toll had been abolished on the bridge. And Brooklyn is such a nice place. So we decided to go to Harlem. Montana objected. She had the housemaid's knee and zymosis. She would not go unless we walked. So we got our luggage ready. We had a pleasant time in Harlem. It rained all day. We made a sensation with our luggage. Biggie boy followed us and called out "It's Jack the Ripper!" He was arrested on suspicion, and Mary Minter identified him as the miscreant at once.

CHAPTER II. Kingsbridge—Legend of the East River—Observations on Life in General—Hanging Out for the Night—The Prune House—Story of the Hucksters—We Go to Morrisania. It was a glorious morning, late spring and early fall, just the time when the visiting country cousin takes on a deeper shade of green, and the young year seems like a Mott street maiden trembling on the brink of a six months' sentence. Harriet picked up a morning paper and read us the Legend of the East River. It was the sad, sad story of Sophia Liebschitz, who tried to drown her doll baby because her mother had spanked her for bilking her baby brother out of his share of the sauerkraut. She gazed longingly at the swishing water and then pressed her infant closer to her bosom. "Great scalding tears welled from her eyes, and splashed as they fell upon the innocent babe's face. "Oh! it was pitiful, in this whole city full, Friends she had none. "Then, with a startled look up and down the wharf, and out, far out upon the swelling bosom of the East river, heart broken, miserable Sophia Liebschitz hurried the sleeping infant. "With a smothered shriek of despair the agonized mother turned and buried her face in her hand. Now it was her turn to weep. "Restraining hands were near, however, and Sophia found herself clasped in the arms of two sturdy mechanics, William Tutthill of 622 Water street, and Robert Thomas, of 288 Delancey street, who were passing by on a Belt line car."

The baby was fished out with a boat hook. But its little life was gone; the sawdust was a shapeless mass in its little muslin stomach. Montana said it was the saddest thing she had ever heard. You see worse things in Punch than what Montana says sometimes. Late in the day we returned to Harlem and put up at the Prune House. We had some trouble finding this hotel. We arrived from Kingsbridge footsore after our long ride. We struck a deserted part of the town. Georgiana said she knew a hotel, and we followed her. We followed her for four hours. Then she confessed that the hotel she knew was in Morrisania. We came across a solitary loafer. Harriet asked him if he could tell us a good place to hang out for a night. He said yes, there was a butcher shop around the corner; we could get up on the hooks in front and hang out all we wanted. He was a coarse loafer.

We found the Prune House at last. It was a building standing all alone at the juncture of two of the main streets. We retired early, but were awakened about midnight by a dreadful squealing of pigs and the cackling of chickens. We rushed out into the hall and demanded to know what it was. "It's only the hucksters coming in; go back to bed, you idiots," said the landlord.

We afterward learned that the Prune House had several boarders who paid for their keep by raising chickens—off other people's roofs. These were the hucksters he spoke of. The meals in the Prune House are good in consequence. We left the Prune House at an early hour and started cross country for Morrisania. Morrisania is a quaint old town. Harriet said she knew a young man in Morrisania. He used to come to see her.

After this shock we decided to return to the city on the "L." The ticket chopper objected to the goat. "No hanimiles his allowed," he said. So we had to walk back. "When will we go to Harlem again?" said Harriet when we were once more safe in my room. "Never!" said Montana. "You can count me dead against Harlem as long as there is a tail on a goose!"

And the goat, standing on his hind legs before the window peering out into the night, gave a strong approval to the sentiment. THE END. —New York Evening Sun.

Exposed His Ignorance. "I don't see why she refused me," complained young Wabash. "I asked her in French."

"Idiot!" exclaimed his friend, "why didn't you stick to English? She was born in Paris."—New York Recorder.

A Satisfactory Answer. Guest (in restaurant)—Waiter, are you sure these eggs are fresh laid? Waiter—Yesir, indeed, sir; 'tain't two minutes since they was laid on the plate.—New York Continent.

I HAVE SOMETHING TO TELL YOU.

But you don't want to tell your neighbors because they will get them away from you.
