THE OCTOROON

A STORY OF SLAVERY DAYS.

BY MISS M. E. BRADDON.

you hide your face from me—when may your eyes refuse to meet those of the man you would have murdered?

"Murdered!" exclaimed Gerald and Mortimer, while the women listened with white and terrified faces to the disclosures of the returned wanderer.

"Yes, murdered. It is a foul word to speak beneath the broad blue sky, and in the sunlight of yonder heaven, but it is the word for all that."

"Silas Craig," cried Augustus Horton, "have you no word to answer to all this? Can you sit calmly there and hear these accusations? Speak, man, speak, and give your answer to the law."

"He cannot!" said Philip Treverton, pointing to the lawyer. "Is that the attitude of a man who is falsely accused? Look at him; look at him crouching like a beaten hound beneath his master's whip."

"Do not speak of him," cried Gerald Leslie, impetuously, "but explain this mystery. How is it that for a twelve-month you have disappeared from New Orleans, to return at this moment of ruin and despair?"

"I will tell you," answered Philip Treverton; "and I call upon this man, William Bowen, here, to bear witness of my truth, and on yonder wretch to contradict me if he dare. Upward of a year ago I was left by you with sum of one hundred thousand dollars in my hands—the amount of the loan advanced to our firm by the usurer, Silas Craig. This was to be repaid upon a certain date; that date fell about a month after your departure for England. I held the money more sacred than my life, and I laid it by in the strong box devoted to important documents."

"You did as I myself would have done," said Gerald Leslie.

"I did; but I was by no means faultless. I was the victim of a vice which has brought dishonor upon men who never thought to blush before their fellow men—I was a gambler! I devoted my days to business cheerfully, conscientiously; but at night the demon of the dice-box lured me from my quiet home, and led me to a secret gaming-house in Columbia street—a house known to all the gamblers of New Orleans, but which flourishes in bold defiance of the law. I had known this house for years, and had been a constant guest at its unholy altars, but there was one thing concerning it that I did not know."

"And that was—"

"Its owner! I did not know that Silas Craig, the lawyer, that sanctimonious attorney whom men met every Sunday morning in the sacred temple of Heaven; I did not know that this man was the proprietor of that earthly hell, the wretch that pandered in secret to the vices of his fellow-citizens. I did not know this, and I did not know that the gaming-house in Columbia street communicated by a secret passage with the office of Silas Craig."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Augustus Horton.

"Ay, the secret has been well kept; and it is a secret that was only to have been known to me when the hand of Death was on my lips to seal them to eternal silence. But the ways of Providence are inscrutable. The day arrived upon which our debt to this man became due. At twelve o'clock on that day I called, delivered to him the sum of one hundred thousand dollars in bills of exchange, and received his written acknowledgment of the money. This done I left as light as a feather. A load was removed from my mind, and I determined to spend a day of enjoyment. I dined with some friends at an hotel, and after sitting late over the table, and drinking a good deal of wine, we adjourned to the gambling-house in Columbia street."

There was a brief pause; but Silas Craig never stirred from his abject attitude, never attempted by either word or deed, to contradict the speaker.

"I played for some hours, but my friends were not such inveterate gamblers as myself and they grew weary of the demoniac fever. After persuading me to quit the place with them, they at last lost patience with my folly and departed, leaving me still at the fatal green cloth. It was by this time four o'clock in the morning. I had drunk a great deal, and I had been losing money. My head was bewildered; my brain dizzy, and my temper soured by my losses. The room was almost deserted, but still I sat with my eyes fixed upon the game, madly endeavoring to retrieve my losses. At this crisis a great brawny fellow opposite to me, a Frenchman, ventured to insult me. Tipsey as I was, I was in no humor to brook this. I sprang toward him to chastise his insolence, and a fight ensued, in which I was getting the worst of it when one of the bystanders interfered, and suggested that we should resort to small swords, and finish the business in a more gentlemanly manner."

"It was a plot!" said Gerald Leslie.

"It was!" A villainous and foul plot, concocted by yonder stricken wretch. Stupefied and bewildered I let them do what they pleased with me, and I knew nothing of what happened till I found a duelling sword in my hand and saw that my adversary was armed in the same fashion. By this time the room was entirely deserted, except by my antagonist, the other man, and myself. This other man—the same who had suggested our using swords—opened a door in the wall, through which I had never before perceived, and pushed me into a long, dimly lighted corridor, which was also strange to me. The door closed behind us, and we hurried along the corridor for some distance, until we were stopped by the stranger who had taken upon himself the management of the business. He placed us opposite to each other, put the swords into our hands and gave us the signal to begin. I felt in a moment that I was a lost man. My head spun round. In the dim light I could scarcely see my adversary's face, as the lamps were so arranged that what light there was fell full upon mine. In vain I tried to parry his thrusts. I had been twice wounded slightly in the shoulder, when the lights were suddenly extinguished and I felt the sharp pang of a stab from a long and slender sword.

"But this stab did not come from my opponent. Although I lost consciousness upon the moment of receiving the stroke, I knew that I was stabbed in the back."

"Excusable traitors!" exclaimed Gerald, Mortimer and Augustus.

"When I recovered my senses I found myself in a lonely boat-house on the banks of the Mississippi, four miles from New Orleans. I was lying on a mattress and my wound had been dressed by a surgeon, but we was too feeble from loss of blood and the pain I had endured to utter a word or ask one question of the man seated by my side."

"You were not alone, then?"

"No! William Bowen, the accomplice of Silas Craig, had opened of the horrible work as soon as it was done; and, under pretense of carrying my body to the river, had contrived to convey me to this lonely shed, which belonged to a friend of his."

"Stop a bit, Mr. Treverton," interrupted William, "when Mr. Craig set out with me that we were to get the villainous Frenchman on to you, get up a duel, and rob you of the receipt for the hundred thousand dollars, it was agreed that you were to be attacked in fair fight, and that you were not to be seriously hurt. It was Mr. Silas Craig yonder who couldn't be content with this; it was he who turned out the gas in the thick of the fight, and stabbed you in the back. You dropped down like a dead man; but the lawyer there was too great a coward to make sure whether you were really dead; he dared not approach within a couple of yards of his victim. He told me to ransack your pockets, and secure the receipt; and then, assisted by the Frenchman to carry the body to the river."

"And you did so."

"I did; but I contrived to get rid of the Frenchman as soon as we reached the quay and then, dropping my bleeding burden into a boat, I rowed down to the boat house, where I sought a surgeon to look at my patient. Mr. Treverton knows the rest."

"I do, William," answered Philip Treverton; "I know that you attended me faithfully and patiently, and that when I recovered, you assisted me to get it to California, whence, after nearly a twelvemonth's toil, I return so rich a man as to be able to recompense the noble conduct of my old friend, Gerald Leslie. As for yonder wretch," he added, pointing to Craig, "defeat has allowed so utterly upon his career of crime that I doubt if the law can do much more to punish him. He will refund the hundred thousand dollars of which he has defrauded his victim."

"I will," gasped the unhappy wretch, rising, and staggering toward the door; "I am rich; take what you will. I shall leave New Orleans forever."

He stopped suddenly, and passed his handkerchief across his lips; when he removed it, it was stained with patches of crimson.

He had broken a blood-vessel?

Assaulted.
Philip Eidemiller, better known by his old time name of Philip the Snipe Shooter, has been living at the poor house for some time. Today he and a companion by the name of Fred Fedora jumped on to Mr. Sampson, the keeper of Cass County's home for the indigent poor, and used him up pretty badly. Mr. Sampson telephoned down to the clerk's office to commissioner Todd to have the belligerents arrested, as they had started for town. Mr. Todd hunted up Constable Kroehler who caught them as they were entering the outer gates of the city and brought them before Judge Ramsey where they were arranged on charge of assault and battery. WANTED—Some old rags at this office.
SCROFULOUS SORES.
From Head to Waist a Mass of Diseases. Suffering Terrible. Cured by Cuticura Remedies.

I was covered with scrofulous sores from my head to my waist, and they were so bad that I could not sleep nights and could be down only with pillows under my arms. My head was so sore that I could not wear my hat, and my hair turned gray. I could not go bare headed so I wore a very soft handlekerchief on my head. In fact, I was a disgusting sight to others and to myself. After doctoring for six years with the best physicians in the country and getting worse all the time, I read in the Herald of your Cuticura Remedies well when I saw in CUTICURA REMEDIES advertised and procured a set although with little faith in them. The first set however did not such a vast amount of relief as I continued their use, and now after using four sets, I am happy to say, that I am entirely cured. Any of the prominent drug stores and farmers in and around Plattsmouth will advise by story.
