FOR PRESIDENT,
JAMES G. BLAINE,
of Maine.

FOR VICE-PRESIDENT,
JOHN A. LOGAN, of Illinois.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

In all the arts of management outside of those which strictly pertain to politics, and Blaine men have also been immensely superior to their adversaries. They have won many delegates by kindness whom the others have either not sought at all or repulsed by coldness. There seems to have been something in the high dictates of the reform which forbid the association of the champions of superior political methods with the men who came here merely to nominate a president. The result has been a count of about fifty winnings for Blaine, with a corresponding number of losses from the other side. Then, too, the local atmosphere has been full of the name of Blaine, and his managers have contrived to send the assurance of victory close in the wake of every mention. The enthusiastic support of Blaine during this convention finds no parallel but one in American politics. Grant's support in 1880 was more dramatic and more spectacular, but it was not more earnest than Blaine's support in 1884. Then again, the opposition to Grant was bold, aggressive and uncompromising, while the opposition to Blaine is weak, divided and hesitating. If the men who are pushing Blaine through this convention will carry into the campaign before the people one half of the energy and determination which they have displayed in Chicago the democratic party will be carried once more to perdition on the resistless current of enthusiasm. As to his record you might as well try to stop Niagara by reading an act for the regulation of mill ponds as to beat such a candidate by quoting the Mulligan letters.—St. Louis Globe.

DONE BY "A SIMPLE TWIST OF THE WRIST."

New York Sun: "It was as good as a circus," said Sergt. Mulholland. I was walking along Broadway this morning when I saw a black-and-tan cab coming furiously up Murray street. The driver seemed to be doing his best to stop the animal, but it was unmanageable. A tall, well built man, who did not see the runaway, was crossing the street. Everybody cried out to him, but the horse was close upon him before he saw it. Quick as thought he put out his right hand, seized the horse by the nostrils, gave a sudden twist, and the runaway was lying flat on his side on the crossing. The cab driver was too much astonished to say a word, and the stranger picked up his hat and walked off as coolly as though nothing had happened. I learned that he was Mr. Lemuel R. Sturges, the owner of a cattle ranch in Texas. He knew a trick the cowboys have of throwing a steer by giving its head a little twist. He practiced it on Broadway, and that runaway horse got a lesson that he won't forget if he has any sense."

A REMARKABLE TREE.

A man in Wilcox county, Alabama, has a remarkable tree growing in his yard. It is of the China species, is ten feet in circumference, and its top has been blown away by a storm; but six and a half feet up the trunk of this tree two small China trees have sprouted, taken root, and grown up as high as the old tree; and just half a foot farther up the trunk of the old original tree a peach tree has taken root, grown up to fair dimension, and is now filled with fruit. At another place there is a blackberry vine and also an elm bush, all in a flourishing condition.

Parlor and bedroom sets in all styles at lowest prices at Boreck's. 591f

The republican party has spoken, and the man of Maine will be the next president of the United States. It is the will of the party that no dark horse, no unknown quantity, no negative candidate, be called to leadership, but that the party be captured by a man, who in right of his own record and his own character typifies the virile, aggressive and progressive forces of republicanism. Republicanism has been a name for victory and proud achievements for a quarter of a century, because in it men of such mould and substance as James G. Blaine have found recognition. All that the republican party has done to make its record the grandest possession of the American people, such men as James G. Blaine have caused it to do, and no man in more liberal measure than he. It is this identity between his public record and the historic accomplishments of the republican party, that stand like milestones in the history of the past twenty-five years of national progress—this instinctively recognized kinship of spirit and aspiration, joined with a personality of commanding forcefulness and surpassing attractiveness, that has so long made James G. Blaine the object of enthusiastic admiration of the great body of the rank and file of the party. The uncontrollable enthusiasm which broke over all bounds of self-restraint in the convention at every mention of his name, and which finally overpowered all resistance in the convention, was no temporary spasm, no mere accident. In the conventions of 1876 and 1880 the spell of the name of Blaine was almost equally potent. The only satisfactory explanation of the action of the convention is that it is the response to the irresistible force of the desire of the masses of the party. Never before in the history of the republican party, or any other party, have the impulse that controlled a convention come fresher from the people; never has there been less of arbitrary interference from bossism; never has there been freer conference and a firmer determination to avoid prejudice and to reach deliberate conclusions, apart from mere personal preferences.

The Plattsmouth Gazette does not take kindly to the nomination of Blaine. It does not say a word as to his character, but makes his foreign policy a subject of considerable comment. The republican party is not naming candidates just at present with a view to satisfying our English brothers, neither is it naming candidates who will approve or work for the English theory of free trade in America. Nothing will recommend Mr. Blaine's candidacy to our naturalized voters so much as the brilliant and aggressive foreign policy that he inaugurated in the early days of the Garfield administration. The Irish American citizen of this country see in Mr. Blaine's past course enough to satisfy them that he above all others is the person to protect them in their rights abroad. It is easily understood why the election of Mr. Blaine is viewed by English journals with solicitude. His election will mean an assertion of America's greatness, of justice to her citizens abroad, and of the doctrine of non-interference of foreign powers with the affairs of the powers on this continent.—Omaha Republican.

GOING MIGHTY FAST.

Detroit Free Press: "We were going west on the Great Western Division of the Grand Trunk, and the night was chilly for the latter end of May.

"Hi! porter," said the commercial man in the bunk overhead; "can't you give us another blanket? It's deuced cool tonight."

"Ain't got another blanket boss."

"Well, just see what you can do for a fellow," said the c. m., putting his hand out through the curtains with a quarter in it.

"Dunno, boss, but I'll do what I kin."

There was scarcely a perceptible pause in the porter's measured tread as he passed our section fifteen minutes later, but the curtains parted and a blanket went through the opening as if it had been shot out of a cannon.

"Thought I felt somebody carrying off part of my bedclothes last night," said a passenger in the further end the car as he worked himself into his boots in the morning.

"Dunno, boss, went mighty fas' las night, making up time; probably run from under 'um."

EMERY A. STORRS, in an open air ratification meeting in Chicago after the nomination of Blaine and Logan, closed his speech in the following eloquent manner:

"Now, gentlemen, you are going to be escorted from this place by a band of music. Music is in all the air. I feel its old pulsings in my very voice tonight. I know what this feels like, and I know what the awakened excitement and enthusiasm of a great and mighty party indicate. I hear the old songs of the old days. I see the old flag, with every star glistening like a planet, filling all the skies. I see the old procession formed. I care not where my place in that procession may be—whether it be up in the front, under the light of the blessed old banner or down near the rear—I listen to the order "Forward," and I march, as you will march, with your faces toward the flag."
