"E Pluribus Unum" FORDHAM COTTAGE.

Did not know the poet had passed his quietest days.

He Moved Out There So His Wife Could "Get Good Air and Dig Dirt"—The Motherly Friends of His Last Days. Doing Editorial Work at $10 a Week.

The cottage where it now stands occupies a little plateau on the bluff, a few minutes' walk above the Fordham station of the Harlem railroad. The road winds up the hill from the railway over a natural pavement of the hard gray gneiss. In the summer one might pass the cottage without knowing there was one there. One end of it is close upon the bank, but the sides and roof are so covered with vines and shaded with trees that the cottage hides the structure in a rustic interior. The cottage itself is a simple and primitive affair that was built more than seventy years ago. It is long, low and box shaped, the sides as well as the roof being shingled. A broad porch runs along the south side facing the lawn, and in front of this grows a vigorous cherry tree which was planted by Poe in 1847 and which has rarely failed during recent years to bring out a full crop of fruit. On the lower floor there are two large square rooms and a kitchen. The middle room was used by Poe as a dining and sitting room, and his visitors were also received here after his wife became ill. She then occupied the front room as a bedroom, and it was there she died.

IN THE FASHIONABLE QUARTER.

The second floor has three rooms with low ceilings, but they are neatly plastered, airy and comfortable. One of these over the front room is of the same size and is said to have been Poe's favorite room. The old fashioned brick chimney runs up through the roof and has an open fireplace, where a cheerful wood fire can blaze and crackle in winter. It is said that Poe wrote two of his latest poems, "Ulalume" and "Eureka," in this room. The quietest days of his life were spent in his home in Fordham. When he became famous for "The Raven" and some of his stories, Poe was living in the city in humble quarters near Washington square. This was then the fashionable neighborhood of New York, and brown stone dwellings had only just begun to start up along the lower end of Fifth avenue.

The reputation which he obtained from his literary work did not materially increase his means. He had for several years been doing editorial work on The Evening Mirror at a salary of $10 a week. He subsequently went out to live in a house along the boulevard in the neighborhood of Eightieth street, which was then well out of town. The decision in a libel suit in his favor gave him a few hundred dollars in ready money, and in the spring of 1846 he rented the Fordham house and went with his wife and her mother, Mrs. Clemm, to live there. His wife, Virginia, was then suffering from consumption. She rallied for a little, but soon again began to fail and died in the following year.

The grounds around the cottage comprise about two acres. They slope away into a shady, grassy hollow. A bare ledge of rocks overlooks the cliff and the valley nearly 100 feet below. To the east the view stretches into Connecticut and over the sea to the blue and distant hills of Long Island. There is a tradition that a British battery occupied this site for some time during the Revolution. Poe was visited frequently here by those who know him through his reputation. His expenses were small and his duties only such as he cared to assume. He took long walks, often going to the city on foot, and his favorite route was down and over the Harlem at High bridge.

MRS. CROMWELL'S RECOLLECTIONS.

One of his neighbors, Mrs. Rouben Cromwell, who lived for many years a few hundred yards from the Poe cottage, remembers him when, as a girl, she saw him for the first time in a cherry tree picking fruit. She thought him "nice looking and sociable." He told her he had brought his wife out there "to get good air and to dig in the dirt," but Mrs. Cromwell observed, "she soon became sick and never went out." Their house, she said, was plainly furnished, and they seemed to be very poor, but they were contented. Mrs. Clemm was called "Muddie" and Poe "Eddie."

On the morning that she heard of Poe's death in Baltimore, Mrs. Cromwell went over to the house and found Mrs. Clemm packing up. She had received a letter from Poe saying that he was about to be married again to a Baltimore woman and he would come for her. She was overcome at the news of his death and repeated that if she could have been there to nurse him through his "bad spell" he would have recovered. The neighbors raised money for her to go on to Baltimore. Poe had been behind in his rent for several months, and Mrs. Clemm afterwards returned to sell off their little household goods. Of these Mrs. Cromwell obtained a clock, a rocking chair and the old family Bible.

The cottage which Poe obtained for $100 a year has been rented during recent years for $400. In 1883 the house and land were sold at public auction for $5,700. For a number of years it has been occupied by Mrs. E. Deichert, the widow of an engineer who assisted in making the plans of Central park, and subsequently laid out the avenues and drives of Fordham. With the growth of the city, land has greatly increased in value within a few years in this neighborhood, and the sight is one of the best in that portion of George—Did you get engaged last night? Gus, my old, my dear friend, tell me how you did it.

Gus—Really, I hardly know myself. Couldn't help it. Just like falling down stairs. I was on the edge of a proposal, she gave me a push, and there I was—engaged.

"Well, I haven't had any such experience. Every time I try to start my knees knock together, and my teeth chatter, and my tongue cleaves to the roof of my mouth. I've tried a dozen times to pop the question to Miss De Pink and slumped every time."

Cost of Water Gas.

A great many people think water gas cheaper because it is made out of oil. This is a mistake. The greatest difference between the cost of coal and water gas is in the matter of labor. The making of coal gas requires skilled labor of the best kind, and at better compensation than is usually given to labor of this class. The work is very hot and requires the closest attention, so that the chance man cannot be engaged for it. The man who does it acceptably must have been educated in it, and must be steady and devoted to his work. In the manufacture of water gas this labor is cut off, and the saving represents the large part of the difference between the cost of the gas manufactured from coal and that produced from oil.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The microscope in the hands of scientists is again playing havoc with the public health. It is ascertained that the dust in our houses is largely composed of living bacteria, and that the simple process of sweeping and dusting furniture transfers these organisms to the breathing tubes and cells of occupants, causing disease and death. According to the theory carpet shakers are dying like flies a number of most horrible maladies, owing to the quantity and variety of bacteria which they inhale; but, happily, in fact, the carpet sweeper is enjoying life and a reasonable degree of health and strength, judging by the regularity with which they come around in the spring hunting jobs.—Atlanta American.

He Didn't See.

The Listener was about to write a chapter on the professional men who belong to the church for professional purposes only, and who come to regard their church as their peculiar preserve, upon which other men of their trade have no right to poach. On second thought, however, he has decided not to write the chapter, but simply to tell a story.

Dr. Plugham, an able dentist, who has his office in that handsome thoroughfare which, from the frequency of its dental establishments, is coming to be the Molar avenue (Plugham, of course, like the rest of the dentists in that aristocratic section does not give a hint of his occupation in his sign, but simply decorates his door with a very modest plate bearing only the legend "Dr. Plugham"), belongs to a fairly fashionable church and is very faithful indeed in his devotions. No Sunday so stormy that it does not find him in his pew; he teaches a class in the Sunday school and takes a prominent part in all church and society proceedings.

The other Sunday several of the congregation at Plugham's church noticed a well dressed stranger at church, upon whom Plugham bestowed a glance of slight recognition, and after the service Plugham and the stranger were seen in conversation for a moment or two in the vestibule. After the stranger had passed out, one of the members of the church tepped up to Dr. Plugham and remarked: "Who was that stranger that you were talking with, doctor?"

"He?" said Plugham, as a crowd darkened his handsome face, "oh, that was Dr. Sledge, the dentist, and I don't see what is the thunder he's prowling around here for!"—Boston Transcript.

THAT POET OF THE FUTURE.

"I've been reading, Riley, in a recent magazine, of your Poet of the Future with the truly rural mien. If the careless, simple fashion in which he'll choose to come to the beauty of overbalancing the drum, and by what his hands hold not, and by what he does not wear, rather than I'd know him, if I met him anywhere, Mr. Riley, I do not clearly see how you can at such a distance say that the poet's 'he.'"

"Or it may be that this singer who shall our souls confess us with bugles—will wear them on her dress; but we shall find her shining with pearls upon her breast, radiant in some cottage as she hills her tabes in the choir of the cathedral we may hear her pure voice swell, murmuring some sweet measure as she serves us from the well; or her hands may not be sunburned—although her gloves be tan; and your poet, Mr. Riley, may not be at all a man in the Poet of the Future shall find welcome and have room, whether singing at the plowshare or sweeping with a broom; but this 'Poet of the Future' that you speak of, ways to a 'him' pertaining, may it not to 'her' belong?"

"Or some women's 'palms' are sisters to the 'honest toiler's' too—and they cannot always fold them when the plowman's toil is through—and it may be that this poet, on whose coming we agree, when really come and with us will be spoken of as 'she.'"
