> The Maryland world's fair board is planning to show in the Maryland building a reproduction of the surrender of his commission by George Washington. The report of the board to the legislature asking for an appropriation of $100,000, states: "It has been suggested by his excellency the governor, and the suggestion has met with much favor, that the old senate chamber of the state house be reproduced in our building, and that a group of thirty-two figures be made to represent the surrendering by Washington of his commission, which took place in that historic hall. Such a tableau would attract many visitors and serve as a feature of great interest. The act is almost unique in the history of the worlda successful general, in the flush of victory, laying down his sword and retiring to the duties of a homely and quiet life after vanquishing the greatest power on earth in a long and bloody war-and is something to be admired as well as wondered at, and every son of our grand old commonwealth should feel a personal pride when he thinks that a deed so noble was done on the soil of his native state, beneath the roof of his state capitol."
