Harry Kuhney met with an accident Friday that came near being serious. He was shooting with a shootgun when a shell loaded with smokeless jowder exploded and the powder burned into the flesh under his eye, and a piece of shell grazed the eye bill, cutting off a piece of the outer coating. It was bad enough but might easily have been much worse.

What has been regarded by some as the birthday of the railway locomotive occurred on Sept. 27, 1825, with Stephenson as the father of the event. The Stockton and Darlington railway had been built, and, through his persistent importunities, laid with iron, iastead of wooden rails. It had been intended merely for horse draft, but the inventor prevailed upon the owners to allow him a trial of his steam locomotive.

Stephenson himself was the driver on that occasion, and, before a tremendous crowd of curious and for the most part incredulous people, he drew a train of nearly 30 wagons, loaded with passenmay, in return for certain timely concessions, place their powerful organization at the service of the empire and be its chief pillar of strength.

This is the consummation that every friend of Germany and of humanity must devoutly wish. It would bring advantage to both sides and put an end to autocracy. The empire would have to abandon its attempt to return to mediaval military despotism and allow its subjects large liberty of thought, speech and action, while the socialists would have to abandon their notion of the state as a mere economic beehive and accept it as the great institution for raising man above slavery to physical needs into spiritual freedom and culture.
