The Merchant's Carnival.

A fair sized audience greeted those who took part in the Merchant's Carnival at the opera house last night, and which with change of program, will be repeated again this evening.

Miss Redford sang nicely, and Miss Nettie Waybright gave a recitation.
Some of the characters were especially good. Miss Kroehler, re-enacting Billy Hasler's blacksmith shop, was fine; Minnie White, wearing no end of diamonds and jewelry, represented J.
T. Coleman. August Bach's meat market, represented by Bertha Lloyd carrying a live pig in a shawl strap captured the audience. A. W. Atwood's representative was also especially good, but there were so many deserving of special mention that we cannot give them. The following is a presented each:

There is no need of a man being idle these times, if he has nothing else to do he can start a newspaper and soon become a blooming plutocrat.

Buck Houck rides a horse that is more dangerous than a Spanish battery. This morning Rainey, the barber, walked up behind the horse which was near the old Mathews corner and it turned loose both hind feet catching Rainey in the stomach with a blow that would have sent him to the other world had he not have been so close to the horse. After a few somersaults the kickee got up and found he was not seriously injured, but he looked like nothing would please him better than a chance to swat the horse good and plenty with a blacksnake whip.
