THE PULPIT AND THE PEW. Minister Makes the Congregation and the Congregation the Minister. Between a minister and his congregation there is an action and a reaction so that the minister makes the conminister, says Ian MacLaren in the Ladies' Home Journal. When one speaks of a minister's service to his people one is not thinking of pew rents and offertories and statistics and crowds; nor of schools and guilds and man Fred Denson caught him. After achievement of the minister is to form question, therefore, to consider about a minister's work is: What kind of men has he made? And one, at least, of the most decisive questions by which the members of a congregation can be judged is: What have they made of their minister? By that one does not mean what salary they may give him, nor how agreeable they may be to him, but how far he has become a man and risen to his height in the atmosphere of his congregation. Some congregations have rulned ministers by harassing trol and became peevish and ill-tempered. Some congregations, again, have ruined ministers by so humoring and petting them that they could endure no contradiction and became childish. That congregation has done its duty most effectively which has created an atmosphere so genial, and ye so bracing, that every good in its minister has been fostered and everything
