long since fallen from its high estate ble purposes. The Chauteau Rouge, The Star Vaudeville compuny, under the "cafe" which occupied the lower portion of it, was for a number of years the favorite haunt of thieves and rufflans. The arrest in the place of Gamahut, a particularly notorious murderer, drew general attention to the den, which it became the fashion to visit in the small hours of the morning. Every celebrity piloted around the slums of Paris by detectives was taken to the Chateau Rouge, where, without any effort of the imagination, he could fancy himself in the company of authentic cutthroats. As a matter of fact, most of the real criminals migrated elsewhere when their refuge began to be an object of curiosity. Their places were taken by outcasts, who were glad to masquerade as scoundrels of the deepest dye for the sake of the pence liberally distributed by visitors.

Still, the Chateau Rouge at night presented a curious spectacle enough. On the counter from behind which were served drinks various, cheap and poisonous, there always lay in full evidence two cudgels, both of them formidable, but one of much stouter proportions than the other. They were for the use, in case of emergencies, of the proprietor, a giant of the name of Trolliet; the lighter one served him to quell minor disturbances, while with its fellow he had more than once to defend his life against the friends of and is beyond the reach of the average those of his customers whom he had blood medicine.
