Queen Victoria and the Telephone. Sir William Preece, who was for nearly thirty years in the employment Latest Cuotations from South Omaha of the postoffice, is fond of relating an anecdote, which, while it rather teils against him, does his vesatility and readiness full justice. It was at the time when a telephone had been set up between Osborne and London, and in order to give Queen Victoria an exhibition of its possibilities certain tests were carried out. One of them was the playing of a band in London so that her majesty might hear the music at the other end of the wire. By some mischance the band was not there when Sir William was informed that the queen was waiting to hear its performance. Tere was only one thing to be done, and Sir William, knowing the possibilities of the teleing was not exactly brisk, but still the phone, hummed an air into the receiver. Then he inquired whether her maniddle of the forenoon practically all the jesty had recognized the tune. "Yes," was the reply. "It was the national anthem, and very badly played."
