Don't Worry.
The farmers of Cullum and vicinity are opposed to the proposed electric railway line, and are circulating a petition against granting a right-of-way through their property. These farmers need not worry about such a line passing through their premises. When this line is built, they will have long since passed to realms above, and their present babies will be old gray-headed men and women.

Shepherd in Limbo.
William Shepherd, the Weeping Water citizen, who it is asserted broke into the Missouri Pacific depot at that place one day last week, and was in the act of opening the railroad safe when detected by the agent, and made good his escape through a window, has been captured.

Sheriff McBride, as soon as he learned of the attempted safe robbery, set about to locate Shepherd, and finally did so in the neighborhood of Malvern, Iowa, where his father and brother reside.

Sunday Sheriff McBride received a telegram from Malvern, Iowa, notifying him that the man he wanted was there. He went after him, and the accused is now in jail awaiting a preliminary examination, which is set for tomorrow (Friday) at which time a number of witnesses will be here from Weeping Water.

The accused pleads not guilty, but admits that he was caught in the depot, and denies that he intended to take anything.

Shepherd is the man who was arrested last winter for running a gambling house in Weeping Water, and was fined $200, and it is a very evident fact that he returned to his father's home to get money to flee the country.

Sheriff McBride is getting to be more of terror to evil-doers every day, and it has to be an awful sleek villain that escapes his clutches.
