Are Flooding the Country.

Now is the season when the mail order houses are flooding the country with their advertisements and catalogues. The way for home merchants to successfully meet such opposition is not by complaining and growling, which has the effect of driving away business, but by imitating far more than they do the methods of their competitors. Mail order houses believe in letting people know what they have to offer. Too many local merchants act the other way and then complain of dull trade. Such merchants can make no headway against outside competition. But the merchant who keeps the goods and attractively advertises them has the advantage every time. Such merchants always have a cheerful smile because business is good with them.—Louisville Courier.

Overcome by Escaping Gas.

H. P. Wilcox, an employee at the gas works yesterday was overcome by escaping gas but rescued before any serious injury resulted. His condition today is reported as better and it is not thought that any serious complications will ensue. The trouble occurred when Mr. Wilcox descended into the tar well at the works to put a plug into a pipe leading into the well. He turned off the gas as he supposed and started at his work when he discovered that he had not turned the valve quite off and that he was in danger of being overcome by the fumes. He started to get out of the well but did not succeed before the gas overcame him. Fellow workmen discovered his predicament, however, and rescued him. Later he was attended by a physician and conveyed to his home.

C. L. Alleman, vice president of the Standard Oil company is in the city today attending to business with Col. Henry C. McMaken, the local agent of the company. He also met Fred Hawksworth, a lieutenant in his service for sometime back, but now a prosperous farmer in Dakota. Mr. Alleman and Mr. Hawksworth had a pleasant visit together.
