CHAPTER XXI. "You Cannot Leave Me Now."

Ill two days and two nights heart until she recognized the Ragtime to be saddled. And Miriam Burrell, sighting Barbara's face as the latter wheeled toward the hills, flew from her window to scratch off a noteto Garry-her third note that day, for she seemed always omitting most important things which needed saying.

"It's come," she scrawled in delighted haste. * * * When are we going to be married?"

Once before Barbara had ridden that road with him alone in her thoughts Now she realized that she had loved him then as she must have loved him niways and marveled at such blind ness. Once, on that other day, she unwarthy comparisons of herself and him were done and gone. Now she her lips were tremulous.

She grew pensive at times. At times, back at a quarrel-ome squirrel in the thicket. She could rest later, and if she could not go to him immediately at least every step the horse took was bringing them for a little while closer together. And her tomorrow was only one twilight and one dawn away. Her tomorrow would be his as utterly as was she herself.

Dusk came, and regretfully she told berself that she must be turning back home. Two rille shots, sharp and startlingly close, whipped through the quiet of that lazy afternoon, but they meant nothing to her. She had reached the

She lifted his head and propped it as comfortably as futility of it, and then she ordered she might upon one thigh and opened his flaunel shirt. The ball had passed through, for back and front the shirt through, for back and front the shirt became immediately wetter with fresh blood. Blood sickened her, but she whipped off the coat of her boyish riding habit and wrenched the sleeves > from her linen blouse. They were desperately scant, yet they provided pads with which to check that dreadful oozing. And when they were in place she turned again to bathing his forehead. A folded sheet of paper came to view when she tried once to ease his heavy pioneer days. Mr. Walter came to body from the position which was numbing her leg, and she seized upon had told herself that all ignoble and it fiercely. It was only a brief line, bidding him come to her, but it bore her name. With instant, bodiless cla"idid not need such reassurance, when ty which had marked all her mental processes so far, its purport was hers.

She had not written-the hand that in an abandon of gr aty she chattered had traced her signature had been un strung for once. She understood. though such knowledge seemed of lit de moment now.

She kept the pads cold and wet. She went for fresh water and stumbled and fell more than once because of the treacherous footing in the deepening shadows. But she was no longer afraid of the dark. She had grown to the day her roan mare strayed off while she sat mooning on a log. She was holding out both arms toward the spot where the valley of Thirty Mile must lie when a team of heavy horses broke around a turn in the road, slowed to a trot at the sight of her and came to an almost childish, almost sweet and abrupt standstill, When the girl rode questioning beyond all else, nearer to them, merely surprised and back nervously.

Something chill clutched at Barbara's heart while she spoke peremptorily to Ragtime who was dancing in sym pathetic panic. There was nothing to tell her, but st knew that these were Big Louie's horses. And Big Louie was a dreamy incompetent. He had left them for a moment, that was all and they had become frightened and bolted. Jut Big Louie never neglected his tea a-they were not wet-they had not been running far. And their fright became less when she dismount ed and approached them, soothing then with her voice until they let her touch their sleek sides without rearing away.

Dusk had come and gone, for it was growing dark. Uncertain, more and more unnerved as she stood and gazed at the forbidding, black shadowed ridges beyond her, the girl had to fight suddenly against an impulse to turn and race back to the lower country and Morrison and home. Even then time. "He will lose his head," he exthe rifle shots meant nothing to herand puide would not let her run. She remounted and rode on a rod or two and stopped to look back at the team which yas watching her. She pressed on and rounded the curve. Ragtime reared and snorted there, and she bare ly stifled the cry which his strange be havior brought to her lips. Because of home." her senseless panic she punished him the more severely and sent him on. And then she saw what the horse had already seen.

A blue shirted figure lay half in the within the trail-and she recognized was talking now to himself. him too. Big Louie's face was upturned, and the explanation of the two rifle reports and the driverless team was here, for Big Louie's hand still clutched the handle of a canvas pail. They had stopped to water the horses; they had been shot down from behind And first of all, unable to move, while horror parched her lips, the girl remembered words which the limp one. half in the road and half in the underbrush, had spoken to her in a moment of sternness.

"Ho has fired upon the from cover." the man who loved her had said. "He has been taking money from a man who was bent on beating me at any price.
