Love is an expert magician, but it can't transform nickels into dollars.

You may at least learn something by trying to teach an old dog new tricks.

Some husbands are mean enough to keep a half dozen mother-in-laws busy.

About all there seems to be any hope of finding out is whether Jack Dempsey was a slacker with or without reservations.

"In fifty years we will be too civilized to kiss," says a Boston bacteriologist. Or does he mean that we shall be too old.

War has begun again in Balkans a dispatch says. Well, what about it? Isn't that the place for wars to begin? It looks all perfectly regular to us.

Instead of investigating the "reckless expenditure of public funds" in others, congress might accomplish more by example rather than precept.

New York is digging itself out under several feet of snow. That is like New York. If anything white and pure does visit that town it gets thrown out.

Perhaps a quicker and more complete check on the recent census might be made by comparing with "flu" lists in the offices of the health department.

You remember what stopped the flu last year, don't you? Well, it was the January blizzard. So let's quit talking of serums and quarantine and arrange for a blizzard.

Unless Mr. Hoover finds out his policies pretty soon, he is in danger of being considered by the people as neither fish, flesh nor fowl, but rather a post bellum substitute.

At first we thought we'd be sorry for Poland where potatoes are used for currency, but on second thought we'd rather be sorry for ourselves whose currency is used for potatoes.

An epidemic of mysterious murders has swept over this country during the past few weeks and in almost everyone of them a woman is either suspected of having committed or instigated the deed.

TREATY AND COVENANT

One of the outstanding lessons that history teaches is that a punitive peace is not an enduring one and that sooner or later it reacts gravely to the disadvantage of the nation or nations imposing it. In the light of that lesson, and of indication that history threatens to repeat itself, thoughtful men of the victor nations in the late war are beginning seriously to review the economic and other punitive features of the treaty of Paris. Not only—perhaps not principally even in the United States—but in England and France powerful voices are raised for a revision of some of the terms imposed upon Germany and for a recession of others. And this is pleaded, not primarily out of regard for the welfare of the German people, but out of a very lively concern for the salvation of neighboring peoples whose future is irrevocably bound up in the German future. There is feared a complete governmental, economic and social collapse of the structure of German society and there is feared also such a revival of the spirit of nationalism in its most dangerous form as would again threaten the peace of Europe and the world.

This is the explanation of recent cablegrams intimating that the British government is losing enthusiasm for the plan of extraditing seven German princes, two field marshals, 24 generals, 10 admirals and many high civilians to stand trial by their enemies for crimes committed against the laws of civilized warfare.

This is likewise the explanation of a copyrighted cablegram to the New York Sun and Herald, the first paragraph of which follows:

"Spreading symptoms of economic ruin and anarchy in central Europe have brought about the momentous decision in the highest quarters, the correspondent of the Sun and New York Herald is able to state without qualification, that the economic clauses of the peace treaty must undergo a drastic revision that will mean practically scrapping them."

It is declared that this action will be taken for four reasons: That Germany cannot possibly pay the indemnities demanded; that their remission will make possible a deflation of national balance sheets; that it will stop the outpouring of paper money; that it will restore the value of continental exchange and so permit the raising of foreign credits to rehabilitate industry. The indemnities imposed upon Germany by the treaty, in cash and in coal, are estimated at forty billion of dollars. The annual interest charge on this enormous sum would alone be two billions of dollars. Even if Germany's trade were prosperous, it is asserted in the dispatch Germany could not pay more than $500,000,000 a year, "and at present she is able to pay nothing because she has an unfavorable trade balance." The dispatch says further:

"At the time the treaty was framed France was obsessed with the fear that unless Germany was reduced to a state of helplessness she would work harder than even to hasten her revenge, and Premier Clemenceau was admired for the manner in which he overruled every one who urged moderation toward Germany, but now it is realized that in heeding the French prime minister's appeals the peace conference paved the way for economic disaster, both for central Europe and for France. Measures must be taken now to prevent that disaster."

The United States government has asked no indemnities from Germany, and treasury officials have taken the attitude that the indemnities of other governments should be reduced to a point that would permit Germany to pay. That was also the attitude of President Wilson before and during the peace conference, but the pressure at Versailles was too strong and he was overborne. The president, as all the world knows, pinned his faith to the league of nations, for which he stood like a rock, to provide not only the means but the desire to ameliorate provisions of the treaty that might be found unduly harsh and economically impossible.

It is an interesting and in a way an inexplicable fact that the entire fight on the treaty in the senate of the United States has been centered not about the severity of its terms but about the league of nations, designed, among other things, to facilitate their amelioration.

And it is equally interesting and significant that the most ferocious assault has been made on Article X, "the heart of the league, calling on all nations to agree to respect and help preserve the territorial and political rights of other nations—to agree, in other words, not to wage wars of aggression under penalty of being boycotted and outlawed. Senator Hitchcock, on returning to Washington from Omaha, caused some excited comment by conjecturing that perhaps the reason why England and France are willing that the United States should reject Article X is that they have further territorial ambition and do not wish this country to stand in the way of their realization. This, of course, is only conjectural. But it emphasizes the fact that it is the covenant of the league of nations that is progressive part of the peace treaty, that it is this covenant that makes for peace and good will, that it is this covenant, and not the treaty without the covenant, that must be relied upon to protect Europe and the whole world from further and greater disaster.—World-Herald.
