in this condition the clear warning of the downfall of civilization. It is many centuries since the situation of a vast population was more critical. Those wretched human hordes now more than half starved, must be kept alive in the next few years. If they are to survive, by means of the surplus food grown elsewhere—which is where America comes in. It is futile, perhaps, in these days, to talk about attaining a higher civilization; the present task is to hold on to what civilization the world already has. The first essential of civilization is food.

Newspaper headlines suggest that here in the United States bread may before long go up to 25 cents a loaf. This fear is not based on the short winter wheat crop, for the United States could grow enough wheat in the worst season imaginable to feed its own people at a price by no means excessive, provided that little wheat or wheat flour were exported. The trouble now anticipated arises, first, from the European demand for American flour; second, from the end on June 1 of the regulation of wheat prices by the United States government.

The question immediately arises whether government control of the market should not be continued, if such consequences of its expiration are threatened. After the armistice, the cry arose that the government should get out of business immediately, and the government did get out of business as fast as it could. But there were some disastrous results, as in the case of sugar. Everybody now wishes that sugar had been kept under direct government control. The railroads have gone back, also, but railroad transportation suffers. It may turn out that a monumental mistake will be made in letting government control of the grain market prematurely expire.—Springfield Republican.

THE COMING FOOD CRISIS

The evidence now seems overwhelming that considerably less food will be produced in North America this year than last year. The south temperate zone has just completed a crop season and its two great surplus food growing countries, Argentina and Australia, report disappointing harvests. In the United States and Canada, the only agricultural countries remaining in the world upon which the human race depends for a large exportable surplus, the spring conditions are unfavorable. The planting season is very late; the railroad tie ups and freight congestion have seriously delayed the shipments of fertilizers to the farms of the country; farm labor in unprecedentedly scarce and costly and the tendency is widespread for the smaller farmers to cultivate only such an acreage of land as they can care for without hired help. No contribution to the world's exportable food supply can be expected this year, or perhaps next year, from central and eastern Europe. Rumania and Hungary before the great war could be depended upon for wheat, as the middle and western European countries could be depended upon for beet sugar, but Rumania and Hungary must be dismissed for the present from all calculations. Russia's great wheat belt is in the Ukraine, but the new Polish war of conquest as far south as Odessa is not the right sort of spring planting. The come back of Russia as a food exporting country on a large scale still seems rather remote, regardless of bolshevism. If a new cycle of wars must be fought for the political control of the rich western zone of the old empire stretching from the Baltic to the Black sea.

The economic chaos and dismal social misery of eastern Europe is now so extreme that one might see

MANAGEMENT OF PARMELE GIVES BANQUET

Managers and Employees of Theater and Their Families Enjoy Fine Time at T. E. Parmele Home

From Monday's Daily.

Saturday being the second anniversary of the management of the Parmele theater by Messrs. A. O. Moore and August Clويد, the occasion was fittingly observed by the management in a social evening and banquet for the members of the staff of employees and their families. Each year the management has tendered some fitting recognition of the services of their assistants and Saturday evening the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. T. E. Parmele was the scene of the pleasant gathering. The festivities were commenced following the second show at the theater and lasted until the early morning hours when the members of the party wended their way homeward. A very elaborate banquet had been arranged under the supervision of Mrs. Parmele, which with her gracious hospitality aided in making the event a most memorable one for all those in attendance.

VERY HAPPY OCCASION

Last evening the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Cheval was gladdened by the arrival of a fine little daughter, who has come to make her home with them in the future. The mother and little one are doing nicely and the father is feeling greatly elated over the addition to the family circle.
