B. G. Westover of Lincoln, who has been very prominent in the work of the American Legion in the state and is a past commander of the Lincoln post, is to leave that city today for Casper, Wyoming, where he expects to engage in the practice of law at which he has been very successful in Lincoln and has acquired a great prominence among the young lawyers of the state. Mr. Westover is a twin brother of Dr. R. P. Westover of this city and is well known to many of the Plattsouth people as he has been here frequently and also to those who have attended the state university. Mr. Westover was given a farewell Saturday evening by his friends in the Lincoln post of the legion at the Grand hotel in that city.

17 YEARS OF EARNEST WORK

The Baptist church at Wabash in 1906 called the Rev. W. A. Taylor for their minister for half time work. During the past seventeen years, Rev. Taylor has endeavored to preach the sound gospel of the Master and during that time has married many couples of that church and neighborhood besides ministering to the sick and burying the dead. The time has seen many changes come to the people and the church. With last Sunday the term has been finished. With these years have come many enduring friendships between the flock and their minister with never a jar or friction and in the closing of his ministry here, Rev. Taylor does so knowing full well that he has in every one a true friend who has been a member of the church while the membership also feel that Rev. Taylor has ever done his full duty to the church.

THE MAKING OF THE U. S. CONSTITUTION HIS TOPIC

Attorney C. A. Rawls Discusses the Times in Which Constitution Was Made Last Night.

From Wednesday's Daily.

Last evening, Attorney C. A. Rawls delivered the second of his series of lectures on the constitution of the United States or rather the circumstances that prevailed at the time of its formation and the bitter opposition shown to its adoption by the various colonies, before the Young Men's Bible Class of the Methodist church.

The first lecture had been on the condition of affairs leading to the time of the constitutional convention and last evening he took up the sentiment of the people of the colonies toward the adoption of the finished document and the great Virginia convention of June, 1788, which had made a thorough discussion of the document.

Mr. Rawls in opening, explained the circumstances in which the pioneers had lived, in isolation from their fellowmen in the heart of the great wilderness and the spirit of individuality that had been built up by the necessity of each person protecting their life and property without the benefit of any organized government and which consequently had raised a sentiment against a strong form of government. The lack of facilities of communication had also tended to make of the colonist a strong opponent of the bonds of government. The speaker pointed out the weakness of the continental congress that had been in session at the time of the war and which had contributed little or nothing to the success of the war aside from the declaration of independence and many of whom returned to their homes rather than remain and assist as best they could the furnishing of supplies to the army, and this had embittered the leader of the soldiers, General Washington. These facts were given to show the lack of the spirit to form a strong government that would bind together the colonies and many of the reasons for the failure of the loosely drawn articles of confederation under which the makeshift government had been operated up to the time of the withdrawal of the British troops and the close of the war of independence.

A very interesting sketch of the great Virginia convention, held to elect delegates to accept or reject the constitution in 1788, was given by Mr. Rawls and in his descriptions one could almost see the benches filled with the great leaders of the day in the Old Dominion, including Patrick Henry, leader of the opposition to the constitution and matchless orator of the revolution; George Mason, who, with Henry, was among the spirits that opposed the pact, and James Madison, clever and ready as the head of the forces in favor of the new constitution, and with him, John Randolph, governor of the colony; George Nichols and Edmund Payton, aged leader of the state, and John Marshall, later chief justice of the supreme court.

The wonderful debates of the two forces had furnished the greatest discussion ever held on the document and after the days of argument the constitution was adopted by a margin of ten votes.

In his address, Mr. Rawls gave many extracts from the speeches of the debaters which showed the wonderful minds that had been arrayed in the struggle and also the sentiment that prevailed against the restraining bonds of a centralized form of government among the rank and file of the people and from these two ideas had formed the basis of the political parties of the nation, that while becoming more conservative in later years, still had their foundation in the two schools of thought at the time of the adoption of the constitution.

The use of astute political methods to carry the constitution was pointed out by the speaker and these had more to do with the success of the document than the great debates at that time, although the discussions gave the future generations a glimpse of the wonderful men who had been the leaders in the struggle.

At the close of the address the interest was so great that Mr. Rawls was prevailed upon to promise that he would deliver another lecture in the not far distant future covering a part of the formative period of the American republic.
