Louisville Man Has a Real Grape Fruit Tree in Bearing

When a Journal representative stopped at the Drake hotel in Louisville Saturday our interest was aroused in a grape fruit tree with several very delicious looking grape fruit hanging from its limbs. In talking with Mr. Drake concerning the curiosity, we were informed that he raised it from a seed planted some seven years ago. It is now about six feet in height and the lower limbs have been trimmed away, which is not the custom where these trees grow naturally, as these lower limbs are the principal bearing ones.
Contrary to general belief, grape fruit do not continue to ripen if left on the tree indefinitely and remain solid and good for seven number of years if not plucked before. The several on Mr. Drake's tree have developed from buds of a year ago and attained their full size early last fall. At the time of the flood in Louisville last September water cut and carried away to a depth of several feet and the large pail in which the tree is grown was tipped over, but none of the fruit dislodged from their branches.

The tree is indeed a curiosity and although oranges, lemons and other such fruits are often grown successfully indoors in this part of the country this is the first time we had ever heard of or seen a grape fruit tree in bearing.
One of the Omaha newspapers is going to send its photographer down to the tree to take pictures of Mr. Drake's home grown grape fruit tree.

Forty Years of Pioneering in the Electrical Industry

It is forty years ago tomorrow that George Westinghouse started in a very small way the electrical business that has grown to its present mammoth proportions. Himsen an engineer, with vision and courage, he gathered around him the men whose names are found in the honor roll of scientists.
The Westinghouse company is credited with having spent the time and money necessary to make alternating electric current commercially feasible, but scores of other accomplishments and perfectings in electric developments are due to the indomitable resourcefulness of the man who first made a reputation by the invention of air brakes on steam trains.
A noteworthy Westinghouse undertaking was lighting the Chicago world's fair buildings and grounds electrically, the greatest accomplishment up to that time in the way of illumination.
Perhaps too much credit cannot be given to George Westinghouse for first catching the vision of radio communication, which reaches its highest refinement in the establishment and perfection of the repeating station, KFKX, at Hastings, Nebr.
