"A PROGRESSIVE," SAYS W. J. BRYAN OF JOHN W. DAVIS
Great Commoner Thoroughly Endorses Democratic Nominees At Lincoln Yesterday.

Lincoln, Aug. 18.—The Bryan crowd, something to reckon seriously with in national politics for over thirty years, definitely passed today from William Jennings to "Brother Charley."

The people of the United States may not accept the full transfer in a single day, as the crowd of 25 thousand people in the university stadium tonight refused to accept it in a day, but the Commoner insisted all day today on his own abdication and announced that he is making it permanent, that the first of the Bryan men from now on is to be "Brother Charley."

"No brother was ever happier in a brother to succeed him in politics than I am tonight," William Jennings Bryan declared in the short impromptu address which he made tonight after his brother's acceptance, and which he insisted was merely to be considered a "benediction" on what he had done this evening.

On every occasion during the preliminary program throughout the whole day, when thirty years of habit led arrangements committees and the public involuntarily to grant the first consideration to the greater Bryan, the latter emphatically insisted that "today was Charley's day," and substituted his brother in the first place.

"Second From Now On"
When a photographer, seeking a picture of the two Bryans and their school day friend, George Hull from Illinois, suggested that William Jennings ought to be the center of the group, the Commoner would not have it, and explained that from now he is the second Bryan.

Originally the arrangement committee had scheduled the Commoner for a forty minute address following his brother's acceptance speech tonight. But when he heard of this arrangement he immediately wired Governor Bryan to cancel it, declaring that he would not detract from the glory that should shine fully on "Brother Charley."

Tonight he insisted upon being the last of the governor's party to mount the platform. On the platform he insisted on sitting at the extreme edge, at the end of the row of seats reserved for the governor's party. There he sat, with an expression almost of fondness on his face. He smiled his gratification when Governor Bryan's speech on occasion rose into epigrammatic points, something near to those which lent the fire to his own oratory and built the foundation for the Bryan political power.

When he announced that he was to say but a few words, and when the crowd shouted lustily to "go on," he raised his hand to quell the shouting and declared again that this was his brother's day.

"Standard Bearers Worthy"
"But I promise to return during the campaign," he said, "to the people I have known so well for thirty years of living among them. I want to bring to you the message that the world never needed democratic leadership more than it needs it today; and that this country never needed democratic leadership more than it needs it today."

"And I declare that the democratic party never deserved the confidence of the common people of this country more than it does today," he continued.

"The democratic party in the last congress was never more progressive. The platform written at the convention in New York is the most progressive platform ever written by a party in this country."

"And," he concluded, leaving no doubt about the fulness of his support for John W. Davis as the presidential nominee, "the democratic party never had two standard bearers who were more worthy of confidence of the masses of the people than it has today, in its presidential and vice presidential candidates."
